SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., LL. D., offered the following prayer:

O Savior of the World, who for our sakes has worn the robe of mortal flesh; grant that by Thine own indwelling we may discover the flowering of eternity in the living forms of time. In the midst of all that saddens and perplexes make us humbly glad to live in this difficult and splendid day, wherein only by contact with life in all its wholeness can we discern its drift. Bestow upon us now the love which casts out fear, that, following the path to which the implacable voice of duty calls us, we may combine the shepherdly heart with a clear and radiant wisdom, and, by our stainless, opulent lives, challenge every man who hears the faintest whisper of that voice to follow in our train. We ask it in Thy name and for Thy sake. Amen.

STABILIZATION OF BUSINESS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in behalf of the western Pennsylvania committee of the National Committee for Trade Recovery I desire to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a plan which was conceived as a stimulus for the revival of stabilization of our business and industrial activities. The plan, set forth in the form of a resolution, was forwarded to me by Edward Jones, editor of the Construction Digest, which is published in Pittsburgh, Pa., and which I understand enjoys a large circulation and is held in high regard throughout the construction field of our national economic life.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

Whereas there can be no real trade recovery until there has been recovery in the building construction industry; and

Whereas the building construction industry, were it not for projects of a public or semipublic nature, would to-day be nonexistent; and

Whereas there is little or no immediate prospect of new private building construction, due to the timidity of capital to initiate projects and the reluctance of investing institutions to provide mortgage money under present conditions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this committee bring to the attention of the National Committee of Trade Recovery for its approval and advocacy the following plan, which in our opinion has all the earmarks of soundness and practicability. This proposal in brief is as follows:

That the construction-materials industry of this Nation be enabled to initiate a nation-wide program of slum rehabilitation in our cities and towns through the construction of large and small units of housing that can be rented economically at a price within the reach of the lowest income groups.

That in order to furnish the initial capital for such an enterprise the construction industry memorialize the President and Congress to levy a 5 per cent sales tax on all construction industry materials.

That the proceeds of this tax, estimated at $100,000,000 annually under present conditions, be set aside to guarantee the interest and amortization of bonds to be issued by a corporation to be created by Congress and to be known as the National Housing Corporation.

That inasmuch as for every dollar raised by such a tax at least $8 in bonds could be issued, such a plan would make available for this national housing program from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 annually, and, therefore, would do more to stimulate general business than any other form of construction activity.

This kind of a housing program can not be objected to on the ground that there are now too many vacant residences. There is no housing surplus in the slums, and if the above amount of money was invested annually in slum rehabilitation it would be many years before the last of our blighted areas would be eliminated.

European nations, Germany especially, have found in the inauguration of such housing programs a partial solution to unemployment problems, a vehicle for elevating the standards of living, and that the projects themselves are economically successful.

Funds of this proposed National Housing Corporation should also be made available for those who wish to remodel existing structures. Many such dwellings, even though old, are structurally sound, and can be modernized through relatively small expenditures.

The time has long since passed for talking. Waiting for some one else to start something has not and will not get us on our way. Some one has to initiate productive construction enterprises. And there is none better fitted for this task than the construction industry itself.

If the heads of our construction-materials industries will get together and act on this suggestion, it will not be long before concrete results will be forthcoming.

STABILIZATION OF INDUSTRY AND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to present a plan for the stabilization of industry and employment, which is sponsored by Prof. Knox McIlwain, of Philadelphia. I have read the plan with much interest and believe it merits a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that our legislators and our people may have an opportunity to consider its merits. The plan, sponsored by Professor McIlwain, was placed in my hands by Edward A. Kelly, a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia, who has shown a marked interest in humanitarian and economic problems.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

In most attempts to evaluate the causes of economic maladjustments or depressions great stress is laid on a discussion of such subjects as the gold standard, the unequal distribution of wealth, the tariff, the operation of the stock market, private or government operation of industry, etc., which are in reality only details of the industrial system which society has constructed. Such discussion of details, some of them of a very complicated nature, usually only serves to cloud the main issues to anyone who is not a specialist in the particular field discussed, and is regrettable in its effects. The fundamental issues in the industrial scheme are raw materials, labor, and efficient production and distribution. Raw materials are present in sufficient quantity and there has been for some years an oversupply of labor, so that lack of these two are not roots of difficulties. The means of production—machines, factories, and efficient management—are highly developed. There are, however, two main lacks in the present system, viz: A proper method of forecasting demand with responsive control of production and an efficient distribution system. It is in these two faults that the fundamental causes of depressions will be found.

Barring major upheavals, such as wars, widespread epidemics, or world-wide failure of crops, it is not impossible to predict within a few per cent the total demand for any seasoned product in a given area. Statistical organizations have records of the demand for years past and can allow for growth of population, decrease in price, etc., and can predict fairly well, for instance, the total number of automobiles which will be bought in a particular State or county in a given year. The planning group of an individual automobile company, however, has the added problem of predicting what per cent of the total demand will be for its particular make of car. In a competitive market this is always extremely difficult, if not impossible. During periods when the people are sanguine both the total demand and the percentage allotment to individual companies will be overestimated, which results frequently in a temporary oversupply of maybe 50 per cent of the total normal demand. During periods of depression equally serious underestimates will be made.

The other fault, inefficient distribution, is most strikingly evident from a comparison of the retail and factory costs of the usual articles of commerce. The factory cost of most staple articles varies from 15 to 35 per cent of the retail cost. Using an average figure of 25 per cent for the factory sales price (this includes the manufacturer's profit), it costs three times as much to sell an article as it does to make it. The reason for this high cost of selling is not difficult to find. In almost every neighborhood there are two or three grocery stores, usually within a few yards of each other; at every important crossroads there are from two to four gasoline stations, some selling 20 or more brands of gasoline; in many places two railroads run between two towns, running trains which leave at the same time, arrive at the same time, charge the same fares, and are each half full. Such examples of duplication of effort and investment could be cited indefinitely and indeed are required as a necessary feature of our competitive system. Even when the business men running the companies can show that economies would be effected by consolidation such procedure is usually held illegal, as in the instance of the "packers' consent decree" recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The present competitive capitalistic system is thus inefficient, wasteful, and every seven years or so exceedingly painful to a large number of citizens. Historically the prevention of the formation of large trusts was instituted because of the misbehavior of many of them and the piracy of the men forming and operating them. However, there are two ways to prevent an elephant from doing mischief, one is to kill the elephant, the other is to train him and to limit his movements to a definite area. Since our traditional measure of killing our elephants, or rather preventing their growth, brings inefficiency and hardship in its trail, and since in at least one instance, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., we have succeeded in taming an elephant, one of the means of improving the industrial system should be to reverse our traditional policy and encourage the formation of large efficient corporations under proper supervision.

Such corporations could reasonably predict the demand for their product a year ahead and make proper provision to fulfill it. They would undoubtedly organize large research groups which in a few years would greatly increase efficiency and so lower production costs. Distribution would be immeasurably simplified, since there would be only one kind of gasoline to be marketed, or at most two or three grades marketed through the same organization. The automobile trust would probably find a demand for six or eight different grades of cars and might well have several salesrooms in a large city, but the overhead expenses of sales would be cut at least one-third.

This increase of efficiency would lower costs greatly, but would have the bad effect of reducing the number of workers required. This could eventually be translated into the good effect of reducing the time during which each worker worked. During the period of adjustment some provision should be made for the displaced workers to avoid the hardship and fear which would otherwise result.

Therefore these concrete proposals are made as a solution for the present maladjustment and the prevention of future ones:

1. Repeal of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. (Some of the fair-practice portions of the Clayton Act could well be retained.)

2. The passage of a law providing that when any two or more companies desired to merge into one company, and all of the stockholders were satisfied, the merger could be made without interference by the Government. If any minority stockholders were dissatisfied, the Federal Trade Commission should appoint a committee of engineers and accountants who would determine fair limits within which the merger could be made, provided the majority of stockholders in each company so desired.

3. The passage of a law preventing holding companies and other forms of complicated corporate structure, so as to prevent the masking of piratical manipulation of profits.

4. The passage of a law that when any company, group of cooperating companies, trade association, or group of cooperating trade associations represented one-third of the total business in a particular field—in a word, whenever monopoly was approached—such monopoly would be subject to the same control now exercised in the case of the telephone company. This control should be liberal, allowing earnings of, say, 20 per cent on the value of the outstanding common stock, of which not more than 10 per cent could be paid as dividends, the remainder being added to surplus.

To encourage economy of management and increased efficiency a provision should be made that the savings accruing from any advance in technique or improvement in method could be passed on to the stockholders for three years in the form of increased dividends, after which time the savings must be applied to reduction in price of the articles marketed.

5. The passage of a law that whenever any man, for any reason wanted work he could apply to a near-by Federal employment bureau, which must either find for him satisfactory employment in industry or else give him work. The rate of pay of such bureaus should be well below the normal industrial rate but somewhat above a starvation wage. About $2 a day would seem to be a fair figure at the present time.

The work to be furnished would be of such a nature as not to compete with industry, but much of it could be made self-liquidating. The construction of roads, bridges, dams, and tunnels; the deepening of waterways, the clearing out and replanting of forests, the reclamation of city slum districts, and the construction of Government airports are typical possibilities. The length of the working week would have to be shortened periodically as efficiency increased, so that the number of workers on the Government pay roll would be kept small. Government employment would simply act as a safeguard during periods of readjustment and as a stabilizing force to avoid the wide swings in business activity to which we are now subject.

The acceptance and initiation of these measures would inevitably restore confidence to great numbers of citizens. Most people hoard money because they are afraid of starvation. When once guaranteed that as long as they were willing to work they could always obtain jobs, the fear of starvation would cease to exist. It should also act to restore confidence through having a stimulating effect on the stock market from the prospect of consolidations. This plan also pumps money into the country at the point where it is most needed. The combination of a mild inflation, decreased fear of starvation, and increased hope for investors would undoubtedly bring us out of this depression. The responsive control provided by monopolies, and the safety valve of the Government guaranteed job will operate to prevent future depressions of any size.

The objections so far raised to the plan are:

(1) That it concentrates too much power in a few hands; (2) that it costs too much; and (3) that people will get in too much trouble if the working week is cut down to three or four days.

To the first objection I can only say that there is infinitely more power concentrated in the hands of the President of the United States and the Congress than there would be in the governing group of any one trust. The controlled monopoly system furnishes the same balance of power and clash of interest on which the American system of government is based. The desire of the stockholders for dividends, of management to retain its control, and of the consumers, as represented by government, for lower prices would operate to prevent gross misuse of power. Any scheme which will achieve responsive control must concentrate power in a few people. The answer to the second objection lies in a consideration of how much more expensive it is to do nothing to cure unemployment. The average man's labor is worth at least $5 a day to society; that is, he produces $5 worth of goods. At that rate the depression is costing the Nation $50,000,000 per day, or $15,000,000,000 a year. In addition there is an unmeasured loss in the physical harm being done to the unemployed and their children through semi-starvation, and also the mental worry caused to those now having jobs. The third objection condemns the plan because it might work too well, but is indeed the most valid criticism. The only answer is that the plan merely permits consolidation and efficiency, and does not require it. The complete solution of the industrial problem would undoubtedly take many years to effect, giving a gradual rather than a sharp increase in comfort and leisure to the average citizen.

It must be stressed in closing that the plan must be accepted as a unit. A guaranteed job without permitting industry to consolidate in strong units would increase taxation and discourage enterprise to a dangerous extent; while the combination of business units for efficiency without taking care of the workers released by such improved operation, would cause untold hardship, worse depressions than we have now, and an eventual collapse of our industrial structure.

However, by training our industrial elephant to operate efficiently, and caring for the individual worker who is temporarily unadjusted, we can in a few years achieve a stabilized system which allows free play for the ambitious individual, offers security from too great hardship to all, and will gradually increase our standard of comfort and leisure to an unpredictable extent.

PRICES OF BREAD

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Retail Meat and Grocers Association of Indianapolis with reference to the rise in the price of bread. It is brief, and I shall read it:

INDIANAPOLIS, June 9, 1932.

The Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: On Monday, June 6, we wired you a night letter to investigate at Washington the price fixing of bread.

The chain stores here in Indianapolis are now selling a pound loaf of bread, sliced or unsliced, for $0.04 per loaf. They have large banners and streamers announcing to the general public that the $0.04 per pound loaf of bread is here to stay on their store fronts and in their stores.

On Monday, June 6, the wholesale bakers, who were formerly charging $0.04 per pound loaf of bread, sliced or unsliced, jumped the price $0.02 per loaf. The independent merchant is now being forced to sell sliced or unsliced pound loaf of bread at $0.07 per loaf.

Since the price of raw materials, etc., have not taken a sudden advance in price, and the local bakers have effected labor saving and salary reductions amounting to not less than 20 per cent and in some cases 30 per cent, we independent merchants feel that the sudden raise in price should be investigated, as our large bakeries are controlled by eastern capital, called this special meeting of local bakeries that raised the price of bread. This sudden increase in price is giving the chain system of grocers an unfair advantage over the independent merchant.

Your full cooperation would be greatly appreciated in the above matter.

Yours truly,
INDIANAPOLIS RETAIL MEAT AND GROCERS ASSOCIATION,
HAROLD E. VOGEL, Secretary.

The interesting thing about this matter is that at the very moment when the price of bread was raised 2 cents, from 5 cents to 7 cents a loaf, the price of wheat had hit the lowest point, as I remember now, since 1896. Of course, the matter should be investigated. I am asking the Federal Trade Commission to make a thorough investigation of the situation at the earlist possible moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

HEROISM OF ENLISTED MEN IN ACCIDENT AT CAMP KEARNEY, CALIF.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, also I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution in the nature of a petition from the South Bend Post, No. 50, Department of Indiana, the American Legion, of South Bend, Ind., urging that some recognition, congressional or on the part of the Navy Department, be accorded posthumously to two enlisted men who lost their lives and presently to the one man who was saved, all of whom exhibited heroism in obeying orders and added to the fame of the military services of the country in connection with the dirigible disaster, U. S. airship Akron, at Camp Kearney, Calif., on May 12, 1932.

There being no objection, the resolution in the nature of a petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH BEND, IND., June 9, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROBINSON: Inclosed herewith please find resolution adopted by the South Bend Post, No. 50, of the American Legion, Department of Indiana (Inc.), referring to the dirigible disaster (U. S. S. Akron) at Camp Kearney, Calif., on May 12, 1932.

The desire of this organization is that you use your influence in obtaining some meritorious recognition congressionally or from the Naval Department.

Thanking you for your kind attention and your cooperation, we remain,

Very respectfully,
SOUTH BEND POST, NO. 50, AMERICAN LEGION,
G. L. SCHAUS, Commander.

Attest:
E. A. SCHLENDER, Adjutant.

RESOLUTION

Whereas on May 12, 1932, there occurred a fatal mishap at Camp Kearney, Calif., in attempting to moor the giant dirigible, the U. S. S. Akron, to which a detail of enlisted men of the United States Navy had been assigned under orders to assist; and

Whereas when the attempt to moor the giant dirigible was made, it got out of control and arose in the air, carrying suspended thereto three enlisted men, Robert H. Edsall, of Elkhart, Ind.; Nigel Hinton, of Fresno, Calif.; and Charles Cowart, and the first two men named lost their hold on the mooring ropes and fell to their death, and the third, Charles Cowart, succeeded in tying himself to the rope in such a manner, that after hanging suspended for a long period of time he was rescued; and

Whereas the said Charles Cowart stated, upon being rescued, that he had retained his hold on the mooring ropes for the reason, "That he had been ordered to do so." and that subsequently he carried out this order under conditions not previously anticipated in the face of great danger or death; and

Whereas it is believed that the other two men, Robert H. Edsall and Nigel Hinton, acted upon the same orders as aforesaid, which resulted in their death; and

Whereas we believe that this conduct on the part of these three men of the Navy demonstrated the wonderful devotion to duty and obedience to authority, and they responded in the face of grave danger in carrying out the orders of their superiors, over and above the call of duty: and, therefore, be it

Resolved by the South Bend Post No. 50, the American Legion, Department of Indiana (Inc.), That we, as former members of the Army and Navy recognize and commend the courage and devotion of these men in the performance of their duty in the military service as an outstanding example of America's trained forces and their heroic example of courage above and beyond the call of duty, should be recognized by our Government and our fellow citizens; and be it further

Resolved, That it is our belief that the congressional medal of honor or some other suitable award of recognition for merit should be awarded to Charles Cowart and posthumously to the parents of Robert H. Edsall and Nigel Hinton: and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be made a part of the permanent records of this organization and further copies be forwarded to our Congressman, Hon. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON, and Senator JAMES E. WATSON, and that they be requested to take suitable action to carry out the intent of this resolution.

The foregoing resolution, unanimously adopted at the regular meeting, on the 9th day of June, 1932.

G. L. SCHAUS, Commander.
E. A. SCHLENDER, Adjutant.

SELECTION OF FARM-LOAN DIRECTOR—AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, a few days ago the Indiana Federation of National Farm Loan Associations held its annual meeting in Anderson, Ind., and adopted two resolutions, copies of which have been forwarded to me. I ask unanimous consent to have them incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BLOOMFIELD, IND., June 11, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR ROBINSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: The Indiana Federation of National Farm Loan Associations, which had their annual meeting in Anderson, Ind., just a few days ago, passed two resolutions and instructed the writer as the State secretary-treasurer to send copies of these resolutions to you and to urge you to carefully consider the same and, if possible, support proper legislation to carry out these things.

The members of this association who were present at that meeting regretted very much your inability to attend and address the meeting, because all of us had every confidence that your sympathies have been and are with the agricultural interests of Indiana and that you will support legislation that will be beneficial to your State and the agricultural interests thereof.

Sincerely yours,

C. C. HENDREN,
Secretary-Treasurer Indiana Federation of National Farm Loan Associations.

Whereas the Federal farm loan act now provides that the director at large shall be voted upon by the associations of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee; and

Whereas from the three persons receiving the highest number of votes are then considered by the Federal Farm Loan Board, who selects any one of these three persons they desire; and

Whereas this federation believes that the director at large should be elected by the National Farm Loan Association of this district and that the person receiving the plurality of the votes should be declared elected: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this federation recommends that Congress pass an amendment to the Federal farm loan act providing the person receiving a plurality of votes cast for director at large shall be declared and be the director at large for said office.

Whereas the situation of the farmers of this Nation is such that immediate relief from the burden of taxes and debts is necessary to prevent their degeneration to the condition of the peasant farmer of Russia, thousands of them have lost their homes in the last two years and have either moved to the cities or become tenants, many upon the farms they originally owned. At the present level of prices of farm products it is impossible for the best of farmers upon the best of lands to pay taxes and interest on his investment, much less to make a profit. Nine-tenths of our farmers have been unable to show a profit for many years. Taxes and interest have been eating into the capital of the farmers until bankruptcy is just ahead, and when general bankruptcy of the farmers occurs the Nation is doomed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the secretary-treasurers and officers of the various national farm-loan associations in Indiana assembled at the Indiana Federation of National Farm Loan Associations, hereby express our unqualified approval of the Senate bill (No. 1197) known as the farmer's farm relief act, introduced in the United States Senate on December 9, 1931, and respectfully ask that our Senators and Representatives work and vote for its early enactment into law.

RESOLUTIONS OF WESTERN NEW YORK FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

Mr. COPELAND presented a letter from Rebecca Adair Dudley, Corfu, N. Y., inclosing copies of resolutions adopted at the annual convention of the Western New York Federation of Women's Clubs, which, with the accompanying resolutions, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CORFU, N. Y., June 10, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For your information I am sending copies of four resolutions which were adopted, without opposition by voice or vote, at the annual convention of the Western New York Federation of Women's Clubs in East Aurora, May 20.

We have a membership of 45,000 voters.

Very respectfully yours,

REBECCA ADAIR (MRS. J. M.) DUDLEY,
Member, Resolutions Committee.

No. 1: Believing that public opinion in America will be a great influence in bringing about disarmament and in promoting peace: Be it

Resolved, That the Western New York Federation of Women's Clubs shall use its influence—

(a) To secure the close cooperation, official or unofficial, of the United States Government with the League of Nations in every effort for substantial progress in the reduction of armaments; and

(b) To secure speedy adherence of the United States to the World Court, as an assurance of our sincerity in the promotion of international security and friendliness; be it further

Resolved, That we urge our local clubs to concentrate during the coming year on a study of international affairs and keep close watch upon Government action.

No. 2: Believing that the decision of the Supreme Court in refusing citizenship to Doctor Macintosh, of Yale University, tends to strengthen the military spirit in America, and puts our country in a false light before other nations, and believing that the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Hughes expresses the convictions of our Christian people: Be it

Resolved, That we call upon our representatives in the House and Senate at Washington to exert their efforts to have the Griffin and Cutting bills reported out of committee and enacted into law.

No. 3: Admitting that the prohibition law has not yet functioned satisfactorily owing largely to conscienceless assaults made upon it, we believe that conditions are infinitely better now than when we had the open saloon: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we oppose all agitation against the eighteenth amendment and call for a fair and honorable observance and enforcement of this and all law; and be it further

Resolved, That should the present propaganda for a referendum on the prohibition question be successful, we call upon Congress to oppose the submission of a bald "Yes" or "No" ballot on repeal, but instead to see that the alternate plans of the wet element are included, so that we may not be tricked into voting blindly on prohibition with no assurance that a far worse situation may not follow.

No. 4: Recognizing the immense power of the movies for good or evil, and recognizing the deep degradation that now marks the pictures shown, and recalling that the so-called regulators of the business are in the pay of the movie companies: Be it

Resolved, That we favor the passage of the Brookhart bill and call upon our representatives in Washington to support it.

REDUCTION IN APPROPRIATION FOR RAILROAD-VALUATION WORK

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have received numerous petitions from employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The one I hold in my hand is typical. It is short, and I ask that the wording of the petition may be read by the clerk at this time.

There being no objection, the petition was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Reference is made to page 29, line 5, of the independent offices appropriation bill, wherein the appropriation of $2,750,000 for carrying on the work of the valuation of common carriers was stricken by the Senate Appropriations Committee and in lieu thereof a sum of $750,000 was substituted for the completion of the work.

This work is very necessary in that it provides a base from which all passenger and freight rates are reckoned. It is a base for the issuance of securities against the property, and provides information for tax purposes.

The following voters of the State of Maryland who are employed on this work respectfully solicit your assistance to the end that the House figure of $2,750,000 be restored by an amendment from the floor of the Senate, or in the conference committee of the two Houses of Congress, in order that they may not be forced out of employment.

It is estimated that if the appropriation as reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee as of June 10, 1932, becomes final the result will be that not less than 750 employees out of a total of 952 will be dismissed from the service on July 1, 1932, with less than two weeks' notice.

PRICES OF SOAPS

Mr. BARBOUR presented a letter from J. Eavenson & Sons (Inc.), signed by I. Katz, vice president, etc., Camden, N. J., relative to prices of soaps, which, with the attached clipping, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMDEN, N. J., June 8, 1932.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BARBOUR: During the course of the debate on the Shipstead amendment to the tax bill, H. R. 10236, which amendment proposed to lay an additional tax on imported oils and fats, some statements were made on the floor of the Senate to the effect that the price of soap had not decreased since the decline in the price of raw materials. This obviously is a misapprehension on the part of the Senators who made the statements, as there has been an enormous decline in the price of soap of all classes. Might we request your kind offices, therefore, to the extent of placing this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that the statements as made will stand corrected?

If any Senator is desirous of ascertaining the prices of laundry soaps or other soaps, what he wants to do is to ask for information from the smaller concerns who have no advertised brands. He will then find that the price of laundry soap, as well as all other soaps, has dropped the last two or three years to less than half in price. He will find, for instance, that the sixty 1-pound-bars case of yellow laundry soap is selling anywhere from around $1.50 to $1.75 a case instead of $3 to $3.50, which it sold at formerly. Also, toilet soaps are selling at less than half the price.

Even the large companies are selling enormous quantities of bulk soaps and nonbranded soaps at tremendously reduced prices; some of these nonadvertised brands are passing or have already passed the advertised brands in volume.

In addition to this even a great many of the advertised brands have dropped their prices, which you can easily find out by checking up with the large companies.

Cincinnati, Ohio, is the largest distributing center of soap in the United States, and if you will refer to the Department of Labor, Bureau of Statistics pamphlets you will find that the price of laundry soap at Cincinnati has dropped from $4.70 per box in 1930 to $2.68 per box of 100 cakes in March, 1932, a reduction in price of over 40 per cent. The price of soap at Philadelphia, as shown by the March bulletin of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, appears to be down only 35 cents per box. However, this is because the manufacturer whose price the Labor Department quotes has preferred to greatly enlarge the cake of soap which he sells rather than to change his base price as much as other manufacturers have changed theirs. Certainly he would have to sell his soap at approximately the same price as the Cincinnati manufacturers or he would not be able to sell a pound. I personally know and can prove to you that sixty 1-pound bars of high-grade laundry soap is selling in the Philadelphia market as low as $1.50 a case, and it is being resold to the public as low as 3 cents a bar.

Let me assure you that the public is to-day buying soap at the lowest prices that it has for the last 20 years, no matter from what manufacturer the soap may be purchased.

Inclosed you will please find copy of an advertisement of one of our larger department stores, which appeared in the Philadelphia newspapers showing a sale of soap, 40 cakes for $1, or 2½ cents a cake to the public. This is a very high-grade toilet soap which we are making for them, and our price to them is about 1½ cents a cake. These prices are the lowest at which toilet soap has ever been sold in the history of our country.

Soap is cheap, and it rightly should be in this hour of depression, as the best way to sustain the morale of a man out of a job is to see that he has the means of keeping himself clean. Most community chests, realizing this fact, issue free soap along with their food rations. I hope you will realize that any criticism of the prices at which soap is selling at the present time is most unjust, as you can readily ascertain by investigating any of the official Government records.

May I add, in respect to fish oil, of which there has been much discussion in the Senate lately, that domestic fish oil constitutes less than 1 per cent of all the oils and fats consumed annually in America for all purposes; so it can be seen that fish oil is an exceedingly unimportant oil in the oils and fats economic scheme. Aside from this, over 50 per cent of the menhaden fish oil—the domestic fish oil which is produced in the largest volume—is used in the paint industry, so the proportion of it which goes into soap is exceedingly small in relation to the total ingredients used in the soap kettle.

If you will be kind enough to investigate, you will find that all soaps all along the line have had a radical decline, and are at the present time still going down in price.

During this depression the soap industry by scientific application and by close economy has been able to keep their men employed, and in spite of loss of volume have maintained their industry intact. In our own plant we are employing more people this year than last year, and as far as I know it is the only plant in this vicinity which is employing labor on full time. The passage of the Shipstead amendment would, of course, have utterly disabled our business and rendered it impossible to employ anywhere near the number of laborers at present employed.

Yours very truly,
J. EAVANSON & SONS (INC),
I. KATZ, Vice President and General Manager.

BIMETALLIC MONETARY STANDARD

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter on the subject of bimetallism from Mr. Charles B. McCrory, of Okmulgee, Okla., under date of June 6, 1932, addressed to Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, Member of Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OKMULGEE, OKLA., June 6, 1932.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Congressional Office, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: You perhaps would be surprised at the reaction of the average citizen to the suggestion that our Government reduce the value of the present 200-cent dollar by a more liberal use of silver, and if necessary return to a bimetallic basis. He may or may not know why he favors such a system. He does know, however, that to relieve the depression which so severely paralyzed business in the early nineties both the Republican and Democratic Parties in their respective platforms, recognizing that it was hopeless under then existing conditions to increase price levels by a tender of credits, declared for the use of both gold and silver as a standard money.

The Republicans, then under the leadership of such a statesman as McKinley, advocated bimetallism with international agreement. The Democrats advocated the return to bimetallism, independent of international agreement, as it had existed in the United States from 1792 until 1873.

The Republican National Convention, in June, 1892, declared: "The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican Party demands the use of both gold and silver as a standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals."

If I remember correctly, the Republican platforms of Pennsylvania and other States in 1892 also emphatically indorsed bimetallism.

That the American people from tradition have favored bimetallism is evidenced by the logical arguments which distinctively characterized the Forty-fifth Congress when such eminent Republican statesmen as James G. Blaine, of Maine, Davis, of West Virginia, McDonald, of Indiana, Jones, of Nevada, McKinley, of Ohio, and Ingalls, of Kansas, advocated the use of both gold and silver as a standard money; James G. Blaine in submitting his arguments in support of the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, among other things, says:

"Gold and silver are the money of the Constitution, the money in existence when the Constitution was formed, and Congress has the right to regulate their relations," as disclosed by his treatise entitled "Twenty Years of Congress," on page 606. In referring to the silver dollar this able statesman says: "Such a silver dollar as will not only do justice among our citizens at home, but prove an absolute barricade against the gold monometallists."

Senator Davis, of West Virginia, is quoted as favoring the utilization of silver, "because," (as he insisted), "it is one of our chief products, will make the money known to the Constitution more abundant, will relieve distress, and lead back to prosperity."

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, after referring to gold as "the money of monarchs," is quoted as saying: "That the public debt is payable in silver, and if the money unit should be established in the metal least subject to fluctuation—that metal is silver."

The Congressmen from Pennsylvania, and from the South and West, also championed the principles advocated by the statesmen whom I have quoted, while the Representatives from New England, New York, and New Jersey allied themselves with the then bond-holding interests in favoring the gold standard.

I submit that if the principles of the national and State platforms in 1892 and 1896, and those successfully maintained by such a distinguished statesman as James G. Blaine, were sound then, they are sound now.

The American citizens knew then, as they know now, that the country, with pathetic success, was at that time as now, trying to do business with a 200-cent dollar. In referring to the 200-cent dollar we refer to the value of money in exchange for what it will purchase, or, in other words, its purchasing power.

It does not, Mr. Congressman, seem to impress but few of our present-day statesmen that vigorous and concentrated efforts should be made with the use of silver to lower the present high value of the dollar; the dollar, together with gold, has increased to a 200-cent dollar, and correspondingly lowered the value of everything measured by it. A 200-cent dollar is a dishonest dollar.

We note that Senators WHEELER, BORAH, and THOMAS, and a few other eminent statesmen, courageously voice the sentiment demanding a more liberal basis for the coinage and circulation of money. History records that this and other leading nations of the world were on a bimetallic basis for many generations before Mr. Bryan was born, and yet it is my observation that when a statesman now advocates bimetallism, some financial fop, instead of seriously studying the history and principles of bimetallism, flippantly refers to it as "Bryanism."

It is not improbable that the gold discoveries in this and other countries in 1848, and subsequently, supplied sufficient currency and incidental credits for the volume of business as then existed. In 1873 the accumulated supply of gold may possibly have justified the legislation, though insidiously passed, which demonetized silver and established the single gold standard, which at the sacrifice of all other kinds of property still remains the basis of our financial system.

It is not improbable that during the quarter of a century previous to the widespread financial depression of 1893 the gold supply of the world did not increase with the increased demands and volume of new business. This was the factor which so materially contributed to the bank failures and prolonged depression commencing in 1892 and 1893.

Following the educational campaign of ninety-six came the discovery of gold in Alaska supplying hundreds of millions in gold bullion. This volume of newly discovered gold so relieved the country of the depression following the campaign of ninety-six as to obviate the necessity of bimetallism at that time.

There has been no great gold discovery for over a quarter of a century. The volume and demands of business during the same quarter have tremendously increased. Has not this increase in the volume of business increased the necessity for a corresponding increase in currency?

Estimate, if you can, the added thousands of newly discovered products of commerce, including the multiplied millions of business transactions incident to carry on even but a few of our new enterprises, such as our modern electric, petroleum, automobile and insurance enterprises, and you will readily appreciate the significance of the inquiry as to whether the increase in the products and volume of business has likewise increased the necessity for an increase in legitimate currency. Can securities or credits be depended upon, in lieu of currency, in times of extreme depressions?

When a tender of bank credits fails, as is characteristic of the credit system, to relieve the business public, is not, as maintained by many students of economy, an increase and a widespread circulation of legal tender currency the only weapon with which to fight a depression? I refer to a depression by which price levels have been forced below the economic line to the extent of increasing the dollar value as to destroy the buying and borrowing power of the public.

You will recall that during the last decade, and until 1929, enterprises were freely maintained as the results of inflated and inexcusable credits. These credits, instead of being gradually deflated, were by our masters of finance abruptly and ruthlessly deflated. This abrupt and remorseless deflation caused the crash of 1929. Deflations are always accompanied by an increase in the value of money per unit and a corresponding decrease in the value of property. They involve falling prices, the repayment of loans, unemployment, bread lines, suicides, and a trail of tears.

When deflation is forced below the economic limit—that is, to the depth which materially destroys and encumbers the producing and buying powers of the public—prosperity can not be restored by a tender of bank credits. In other words, a tender of credits can only be made available to a people with ample collateral on which to borrow. The psychology of an encumbered people can not be improved by telling them to borrow their way back to normalcy.

Thus far the only remedy provided by our present Congress is that our big banking groups are to inflate credits. The dominating banks of the country conceive of no objections to inflating credits in the form of commercial paper. The same banking groups, however, pretend that it would be a calamity for the Government to reduce the 200-cent dollar by legitimately increasing the currency. In other words, from the big bankers' viewpoint, inflation is commendable if it may be administered by the bankers, but lamentable if it is to be administered by the Government in the form of an increase in legitimate currency.

In an endeavor to remedy the present economic condition by legislation or otherwise, keep in mind that a 200-cent dollar, plus, necessarily means 50-cent property, minus. This is true, whether such property be farm lands, city blocks, crops, livestock, silver, oil, stocks, securities, or bonds.

The New York financiers, sometimes referred to as experts in finance, being engaged in the business of making profits out of credits and the manipulations thereof, have in the past accumulated millions. The single gold standard being so designed has for years past well answered their purpose. They are the class who are always for a restricted issuance of currency. It was these masters of finance, whom Mr. Blaine aptly termed "gold monometallists," when, in addressing the United States Senate, he referred to the silver dollar as "such a silver dollar * * * as will do justice among our citizens at home, but will prove an absolute barricade against the gold monometallists."

The use and availability of credits beyond the economic limits is a hazardous substitute for legal-tender money. Under such a credit system the big bankers at the height of inflation to which they have contributed call their loans. Credits characterized by poltroonery shrink and vanish. The business public and the Government itself, like a helpless giant, are left prostrate and dependent upon the limited supply of currency as can be afforded by the single gold standard. The dollar is bloated to a 200-cent dollar. The value of all property decreased to the shadows of insolvency. Query: Is our Government's monetary system sound when its dollar value and the value of private properties are so susceptible to the will of a group of New York bankers?

When the people champion a constitutional change in our monetary legislation to warrant the Government to coin and issue more legal-tender currency the big banking group protest that such a change will decrease the value of what is now a 200-cent dollar; an inflated dollar, which has reduced all property values and depreciated and destroyed the buying power of the public.

Any student of economics knows that the abrupt deflation of credits, as applied by the dominating banks to raise the value of gold, has raised it to a near 200-cent dollar, and that by the same process depressed the value of all kinds of property excepting gold. The banking groups are always engaged in the game of making cycles in trying to maintain the wealth value of gold.

The same designing "gold raising" process, as applied in the early nineties, brought on at that time the most prolonged depression, with the exception of the present era of despair, this country has ever suffered.

The method of restoring prosperity which Congress has delegated to the banks is expected, according to the New York press, to function as follows:

The Federal reserve banks, private institutions, are for a period of weeks to purchase once a week $100,000,000 of outstanding Government bonds chiefly from various local banks of the country. When the local banks receive the purchase price for their respective bonds they are expected to hold such funds for loaning purposes. Loan to whom? At this point the plan for inflation stops.

In other words, unless the people and industries of the country still have the disposition to incur further indebtedness aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars and also have ample collateral to properly secure their local banks, the program of inflation fails.

Query: Can an encumbered people, Mr. Congressman, borrow their way back to prosperity?

The proposed plan of Senator THOMAS, subject to some sound economic objections, to issue and distribute two billions of dollars in currency directly to the war veterans, has in addition to its primary objects at least the merits of providing for a direct and extensive increase in the circulation of currency, and credits incidental thereto, throughout the country. It is opposed, particularly by the banker groups, upon the grounds that our gold standard will not stand the strain.

To save the gold standard the veterans are asked to forego the bonus. To save the gold standard the people are asked to forego the benefits of an increase in the circulation of currency. The opposition say that the weakness of the Thomas plan is that the gold standard will not sustain the additional circulation of currency. The average American citizen believes the weakness of the gold standard is that it will not even supply a circulation of currency to the extent of stimulating normal business.

If the bonus legislation proposed by Senator THOMAS were based upon the financial principles so successfully applied by James G. Blaine, William McKinley, and other eminent statesmen, when Congress, to provide silver certificates to retire Government bonds, passed the Bland-Allison Act in 1878, it would materially relieve the strain from the gold standard by providing a silver basis in addition thereto.

This would not in its aspects constitute bimetallism, but the bonus legislation would have the merits of being supported by both gold and silver the statesmanship of the past and successful historical precedents. Legal tender supported by both gold and silver at a fixed or controlled ratio as standard money would be, and under appalling conditions perhaps is, the only effective weapon with which to successfully fight panics and depressions. "Cash," says Walter Bagehot, the great English student of economics, "is the only reserve against any panic."

Inquire of bankers of this country whether there is need for more legal currency. They will tell you that there is a surplus of currency in the banks. This does not answer your question. The answer implies that in the conduct of their daily business bankers do not think—that is, the bankers do not think about the extent of our legal tender; the theory of currency; the cause of high dollar value; the relation of gold and silver; the distinction between a fixed and controlled ratio; and the Government's monetary standard and its relation to the country's volume and demands of business.

The active library of the astute and successful banker is usually limited to Julian's Interest Calculator, Babson's Statistics, and the Wall Street Journal. The leading treatises on economics and statesmanship seldom find any place in his library.

"We all know," says the present governor of the Federal reserve, "the evils of the gold standard, but * * *." This recent confession is an honest one. It implies, however, the inability of the banker mind to solve the problems of economics and statesmanship. The average student knows, Mr. Congressman, that it is a mistake to expect the master of finance to solve the economic and monetary problems of government.

Mr. Blaine in his Twenty Years of Congress, volume 2, page 602, describes the battle waged in behalf of the silver dollar in the Forty-fifth Congress, and refers to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that historic session, and particularly to the report of the Monetary Commission presented to Congress March 2, 1877, as presenting the most valuable contribution to financial literature ever afforded to a legislative body.

The evil effects of the increased dollar value is illustrated by Prof. Irving Fisher, who tells us that "when the dollar becomes a dollar and a half it hurts the business man just as if a yardstick grew to a yard and a half, or the bushel to a bushel and a half, and he had to make delivery on that basis. Until this individual bloating of the dollar is overcome business can not revive."

Mr. Babson, keenly appreciating the necessity of a greater volume of currency, makes bold to hazard the suggestion of a direct and widespread distribution of United States legal tender certificates as the means of increasing the price levels of prosperity. Though the eminent statistician's suggestion upon first impression is shocking, yet when we recognize that the personal and property resources of our citizens are so depleted in value as the result of the increase in the dollar value, and that such resources remain so taxed and encumbered as to be unavailable for credit, we need not be surprised that some such drastic remedy as proposed by Mr. Babson may in an hour of peril be demanded as an emergency to prevent a complete breakdown.

In other words, Mr. Congressman, to the average citizen there seems to be two sides to the picture—the property side (the low price levels) and the gold side (the high-price dollar).

Would it not be possible for Congress to analyze the "gold side," its relation to our system of bank credits, to our 200-cent dollar, and deal directly with the cause of the "catastrophic" rise in the dollar value?

"Money under our present system," observes the scholarly Governor of Utah, "consists of gold, currency, and bank credits." He reminds us that at this time the bank credits are thirteen billions less than they were in 1929. This means that the people have thirteen billions less money available for productive and business enterprises than they had three years ago.

Query: Were the credits deflated by the New York banking group, which so deprived the people of the use of the thirteen billions to save the gold standard? Are the American people to be depressed to enable the dominating banks in their financial ambitions to maintain the integrity of the dollar abroad? Are not our people first entitled to such a dollar as will maintain the integrity of property at home? Is not silver as well as gold money of the Constitution? Did not both gold and silver exist as this country's standard of money for three-quarters of a century, from 1792 to 1873?

You may be impressed by the further consideration that the people's tax obligations to meet the gross indebtedness of our Federal, State, and local governments, aggregating about $32,000,000,000, and our mass indebtedness amounting to multiplied billions, must be paid, and if required to be paid under our present gold standard system, will have to be so paid with 200-cent dollars. In other words, the American people, if they can, will have to produce and market, if a market can be provided, twice as much property to acquire the volume of dollars with which to pay such taxes and indebtedness.

We respectfully submit, Mr. Congressman, that that part of our social class, known as the bond-holding class, has no vested right in the legislation of 1873 which demonetized silver and now unfortunately burdens the people with the single gold standard.

The congressional act destroying silver and retaining gold as our standard of money is admitted to have surreptitiously gone through the Halls of Congress in 1873 "like the silent tread of a cat." The legislation seems to have been directed by the invisible hand of high finance. It is the visible hand of high finance which is now demanding that this legislation be not repealed by an American Congress without international conferences. It is to an American President and an American Congress and not to international bankers that the American people are looking for legislative relief.

Mr. Congressman, with this country being confronted as pathetically pictured by Justice Brandeis, "with an emergency more serious than war, misery widespread in a time not of scarcity but of overabundance, a long-continued depression which has brought on unprecedented unemployment, a catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and a volume of economic losses," would it be too much to expect Congress before adjourning so to regulate our monetary system with the view of decreasing the unit value of the 200-cent dollar?

"Until," says Professor Fisher, "this individual bloating of the dollar is overcome business can not revive."

When England decided to abandon the gold standard it did so. When France decided to decrease the value of its franc it decreased it. Is the United States in these hours of distress to await the results of extended negotiations with foreign countries before an American Congress at Washington may feel at liberty to regulate our own monetary system?

Respectfully submitted.

CHAS. B. MCCROBY.

REVENUE RESULTING FROM INVESTIGATION OF CONTINENTAL TRADING CO.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Daily News, of Washington, D. C., June 7, 1932, entitled "Government Return on Senate Inquiry Nearly $6,000,000."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT RETURN ON SENATE INQUIRY NEARLY $6,000,000—NYE'S FRIENDS OFFER FIGURES IN ANSWER TO CAMPAIGN CHARGES OF EXTRAVAGANCE

By George Sanford Holmes

The Government has collected nearly $6,000,000 in cash for back income taxes, penalties, and interest, as a result of the Nye Senate investigation of the Continental Trading Co., offshoot of the famous Teapot Dome inquiry.

Of this amount $1,398,910.09 was collected in back income taxes and penalties from an unnamed man for Liberty bond holdings disclosed as a side issue of the Senate's Continental Co. investigation. The holder of the bonds was not involved in the Continental Co. with Blackmer, O'Neil, Sinclair, and Robert W. Stewart, his liability being discovered only incidentally.

In addition, the Government has collected $606,097.18 for back taxes and interest on the bonds held by the Continental Co.—some of which were traced through Harry Sinclair to former Interior Secretary Albert B. Fall. This sum includes a 25 per cent penalty for failure to file when due.

PROFITABLE INQUIRY

These collections, in addition to the $3,669,784 collected recently from Henry M. Blackmer, of Paris and Denver, for back taxes, and $60,000 from him for contempt of court in refusing to testify against his friend Sinclair, bring to nearly $6,000,000 the Government's return from the Senate's Continental Co. inquiry.

The Continental inquiry was a follow-up on the Teapot Dome-Elk Hills Senate investigation, and taking into account the estimated values of the oil leases recovered, and other refunds and payments to the Government, a net gain of some three-quarters of a billion dollars is shown.

These figures were disclosed by friends of Senator NYE (Republican, North Dakota) here to-day in answer to campaign charges of extravagance leveled against him in connection with the Continental investigation. He headed this inquiry as chairman of the Public Lands Committee. Its appropriation—the "investment" which brought in the $7,000,000 cash—was $25,000 for this activity and some of the appropriation was returned unspent.

RECORD RECOVERY

As to their bearing on the often-raised query, "What price Senate investigation?" the figures show that from the series of oil investigations, led first by Senator WALSH (Democrat, Montana) and later by NYE, a value has been recovered to the Government immeasurably larger than the combined costs of all congressional investigations since the establishment of the Republic.

Meantime, it is understood, an adjustment is in progress on the disputed income taxes of Sinclair, Stewart, and the late James O'Neil, all associated with Blackmer in the Continental Co., amounting to about $1,250,000 more.

The $606,097 payment came on the profits taken by the Continental Co. itself during its short life. It was a Canadian corporation and made big profits in an oil resale to some of the refining companies. NYE's committee disclosed the company itself was liable for 1922–23 income taxes of $393,653. The Government added a 25 per cent penalty for failure to file a return and interest. The company was dissolved by that time and the Government moved to collect from the four prime movers.

THEY FINALLY SETTLE

O'Neil, who like Blackmer went to France to avoid testifying against Sinclair in the oil trials, paid $151,597 as his share before he died abroad. Blackmer paid the same amount, and from the president and general counsel of the Sinclair Crude Oil Petroleum

Co., Tulsa, $303,194 was obtained to meet the claims on Sinclair and Stewart.

Of the four who organized the shadowy company, Blackmer is still in self-imposed exile in France; O'Neil died there; Stewart was ousted as head of Standard of Indiana by the Rockefeller interests; and Sinclair served seven months in jail on Senate and court contempt charges.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, informed the Senate that Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative from the State of Illinois, was elected Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) extending for one year the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the settlement of war claims act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and of the Tripartite Claims Commission, and it was signed by the Vice President.

NATIONAL INCOME OF THE UNITED STATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 220), submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on June 8, 1932, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is requested to report to the Senate of the United States on or before December 15, 1933, estimates of the total national income of the United States for each of the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931, including estimates of the portions of the national income originating from agriculture, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and other gainful industries and occupations, and estimates of the distribution of the national income in the form of wages, rents, royalties, dividends, profits, and other types of payments. These estimates shall be prepared by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and the bureau shall use available official and unofficial statistics and such relevant data as may be in the possession of the various departments, bureaus, and independent establishments of the Federal Government.

Mr. McNARY. The resolution, as I understand, seeks to obtain information as to the gross income of the country for certain specified years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia object to the reconsideration of the resolution?

Mr. GLASS. What is the nature of the resolution, Mr. President?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will again be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

DISPLACEMENT OF BANKING BILL AS UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, for the first time since last January I found it necessary to be absent from the Senate for three days last week. Before leaving I took the precaution to request a colleague on the Banking and Currency Committee to take note of the proceedings and to see to it that the banking bill maintained its status as the unfinished business of this body. I note from the RECORD that in my absence, and presumptively in the absence of the colleague to whom I mentioned the matter, the Senate has superseded the bill to which I refer and has made another bill the unfinished business, and that without any notice to me and, I take it, without any notice to members of the Banking and Currency Committee. May I inquire if some other bill is now the unfinished business of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The recollection of the Chair is that unanimous consent was asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill. That was objected to, and then a motion was made to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill, which motion was carried and displaced the unfinished business.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, had I been present, Mr. President, I would have very readily yielded to the suggestion to lay aside temporarily the banking bill for the consideration of the appropriation bill. That was understood.

Mr. REED and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. I yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I am the culprit who accomplished the result of which the Senator speaks; but I want to assure him that I had no desire to put off the banking bill as the unfinished business. I asked unanimous consent to lay that bill aside temporarily, and that unanimous consent was refused, and I had to move to take up the Army appropriation bill, but it was with no malice against the bill of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I would have had no objection to taking up the appropriation bill; but I understand that some other bill than an appropriation bill has been made the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. REED. That was done on Saturday, I believe; but on Friday, when I tried to take up the Army appropriation bill, I had to move to take it up because consent to lay aside temporarily the banking bill was refused.

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection to the banking bill being superseded by an appropriation bill, but what I now inquire of the Chair is whether some other bill has been made the unfinished business of the Senate in my absence?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate bill 4536, to amend the agricultural marketing act, has been made the unfinished business by order of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think it was a distinct discourtesy to the Banking and Currency Committee, and not only that, but it was yielding to those interests whose immoral and almost criminal depredations have precipitated the present great distress upon this country. It indicates that the Senate is extending them an invitation to resume their activities whenever they please.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senate intended to displace the bill of the Senator from Virginia. It has been the unfinished business and has been temporarily laid aside, with the consent or at the request of the Senator from Virginia and others for several days. When the bill which now appears on the calendar as the unfinished business was consented to be taken up, I think it was in contemplation of the Senator from Oregon, although I have no authority to speak for him, that the banking bill should retain its status and be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the bill which he had in mind. I do not think it was called to the attention of the Senate that the banking bill was being displaced.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not think any Member of the Senate intentionally desired to have the banking bill displaced. I did not know it had occurred until the motion was made to take up the appropriation bill. On Saturday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] moved to make the bill to amend the agricultural marketing act the unfinished business, and that motion was adopted without debate. So far as I am concerned, I should be very happy to cooperate with the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Virginia to restore the status of the banking bill.

Mr. GLASS. I take pleasure in saying that the Senator from Oregon has been the soul of courtesy to me, not only with respect to this bill but during my service in the Senate. The RECORD shows, however, that the banking bill was not temporarily laid aside, to which I would not have raised any objection, but that it has been superseded.

I ask unanimous consent that after we shall have considered the agricultural marketing bill the banking bill may be restored to its status as the unfinished business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, withholding any objection at this time, I was going to inquire of the Senator from Virginia if that would not in effect exclude the consideration of the bill relating to Philippine independence?

Mr. GLASS. Not necessarily. The Senator from Virginia has been very accommodating in permitting the banking bill to be temporarily laid aside, and I want it restored to its status.

Mr. BLAINE. It is true that it would not necessarily displace it, but the effect would be that when——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that it would not interfere with the agreement because the agreement provides that, if there is any unfinished business, it shall be temporarily laid aside at the night session.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I did not finish my statement preliminary to the possibility of making an objection. I mention the Philippine independence bill, for instance, and the Goldsborough bill, and there are a number of other bills——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The unemployment relief bill.

Mr. BLAINE. And as the Senator from Minnesota suggests, the unemployment relief bill, a number of bills that are all of pressing and immediate necessity. If the bank bill is made the unfinished business now, I can see no hope for the consideration of any other of these bills. It will then be necessary to obtain unanimous consent for their consideration or for a majority of the Senate to displace the bank bill.

Mr. GLASS. The bank bill was the unfinished business and would still be the unfinished business had I been in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. BLAINE. The bank bill was the unfinished business; that is true. I had nothing to do with its displacement; but the bank bill has had a number of days for consideration. It has had its show. It has had its day in court.

Mr. GLASS. The bank bill had two days' consideration and then was temporarily laid aside for emergency measures.

Mr. BLAINE. It had a number of days for discussion, as I recall, before it was temporarily laid aside. As I recall, there were several days devoted to debate on the bank bill—three or four days, if I am not mistaken. That bill has had its opportunity, and I want to see some of these other bills given an opportunity. It is quite obvious to me that when the bank bill is made the unfinished business, what will happen is this: The appropriation bills will come before the Senate; the bank bill will be temporarily laid aside until such time as all the appropriation bills are disposed of; and then a resolution to adjourn will be presented, and this session of Congress will adjourn without opportunity to discuss or consider a number of bills in which the country is very much interested.

Mr. GLASS. That would be equally true of any measure that the Senator might propose.

Mr. BLAINE. That may be true; but I am speaking of measures in which the Senate is very much interested.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator wants to take advantage of my absence in this way to deprive the bank bill of the status to which it was entitled, of course, he can do that. Thereupon I shall move, if I am in order——

Mr. BLAINE. I think I ought to be permitted to finish my statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no disposition to breach any faith. I have had no pledge of faith on the proposition. I have kept faith, so far as I am personally concerned. I think the Senate disposed of the bank bill quite definitely. I think it was generally understood in the Senate that the bank bill was set aside, was disposed of for the time being, at least, and that we would proceed to the consideration of other bills; and, compatible with that suggestion, a unanimous-consent agreement was obtained for the consideration of the McNary bill, the farm relief bill. Consideration under unanimous-consent agreement is to be given to the Philippine independence bill at the evening session to-night. So there must have been a general feeling on the part of the Senate that the bank bill had been laid aside and would not again be taken up unless it were taken up upon a motion.

I can see very plainly that if the bank bill becomes the unfinished business, to be temporarily laid aside only for appropriation bills, then the Senate will have placed itself in a position where it will not act and can not act upon any other measure before the Senate. It must be obvious to everyone that there is a desire on the part of a great many Members of the Senate to have an adjournment, and at a very early time; and that laying the bank bill, known as the Glass bill, before the Senate will not afford the opportunity for an adjournment just as soon as the appropriation bills are out of the way.

I am not taking any advantage whatever of the Senator from Virginia. I do not believe that the personal wishes of any Senator are to be considered at this period in the session of the Congress. These are strenuous times; and if the bank bill is to be brought up again, it should be brought up in its regular course, upon a motion, or in pursuance of a unanimous-consent agreement.

I want to say to the Senator from Virginia that I have no responsibility whatever for the fact that the bank bill has been set aside as the unfinished business. We are now in a position where the Senate may take up the consideration of other bills. In view of the very grave situation, and in view of the fact that the bank bill has had many days for consideration, I think it is my duty toward the people of this country to interpose an objection, so that there will be an opportunity to prevent that which I have outlined, and also for the purpose of permitting an opportunity to consider some of these other bills.

The bank bill is not going to be passed in the twinkling of an eye. There is considerable opposition to many features of the bank bill; and if it is again taken up it will consume all of the time that our leaders on both sides plan to have allotted before adjournment. So I am clearly within my rights, and in no way breaching any good faith whatever, so far as I am personally concerned, in interposing an objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Virginia presently. Later on, when we see how these measures are progressing, how we are proceeding, I then perhaps and no doubt will be placed in a position where I can withhold any objection to making the bank bill the unfinished business; but I think these other bills ought to be given consideration.

Under the circumstances, I must interpose the objection to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am not astonished that the Senator from Wisconsin thinks that after opposing the bill in a 2-hour speech it was disposed of. Nevertheless, others of us had not that conception of the situation; and I shall resort to any parliamentary expedient, regardless of the requirements of courtesy, to restore the bank bill to the status that it held when I was necessarily away.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 88) to authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof.

Mr. BLAINE. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MAILING OF UNSOLICITED MERCHANDISE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1663) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, some statement should be made with regard to this measure, or it should be read by the clerk.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is a very important bill. The chairman of the committee is absent. I think some statement should be made regarding its attitude, and the general purposes of the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the bill is designed to end a "racket" which has been going on for some years—the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails to the annoyance of the public. In these hard times it is difficult enough for legitimate local business enterprises to exist without being compelled to endure unfair competition from those who seek to "muscle in" through the United States mails. There was some objection to the bill, in that it was deemed too strict; but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] offered an amendment to liberalize the measure. I should like to inquire of the Chair if the amendment has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. In that event, I do not see that there should be any opposition to the bill. Its enactment into law is highly recommended by the Postmaster General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter unsolicited merchandise which any person desires to send for the purpose of sale to the addressee shall not be accepted for mailing. The term "person," when used in this act, means an individual, partnership, corporation, or association, except any religious, charitable, or eleemosynary society or institution: Provided, That the Postmaster General may provide by suitable regulations for the submission of applications by any such religious, charitable, or eleemosynary society or institution, accompanied with satisfactory evidence of its bona fides, for the privilege of sending through the mails unsolicited merchandise bearing the pledge of the sender to pay the return postage if undeliverable or refused.

SEC. 2. If such unsolicited merchandise is deposited in the mails it shall not be delivered to the addressee, but, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, shall be returned to the sender charged with postage due at double the regular rates to be collected from him upon delivery. On failure of the sender to pay such return postage the matter shall be disposed of as other dead matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Arizona how the post office is to determine whether a package that is submitted to be mailed has been ordered or is being sent unsolicited.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Utah will understand that this is a business which has grown to considerable proportions. Some firm sends out neckties that people do not want. Another firm sends out Christmas cards that those who receive them do not want. The mailings are heavy. It is very easy for the Post Office Department, when a complaint is once made, to ascertain the nature of the business in which the company is engaged. As the Senator will note, if the unsolicited matter goes through the mail, and the party to whom it is addressed does not desire to receive it, it is returned to the sender with double postage, collect. If the sender thinks enough of the neckties that he has sent out or the Christmas cards that he has sent out to pay double postage and take them out of the mail, he can have his property back.

Mr. KING. The question in my mind was how the post office could determine, when a package is presented, that it is being sent unsolicited.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have inquired of the department and am advised that there will be no administrative difficulty in that respect at all; that the firms sending out this kind of mail are well known, and the mailings are easily identified.

Mr. KING. Suppose some friend of the Senator's who is not engaged in the merchandising business should send to him a package of merchandise, a box of candy, or what not. How is the Post Office Department to determine whether it has been solicited or not?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the sender were my friend, he would not put in a bill with a box of candy and ask me to remit.

Mr. KING. No; that is true. Nevertheless the Senator, not knowing the character of the package, might reject it.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; not at all. The unsolicited character of the merchandise is evident when the receiver obtains a package inclosed in which is a request either to return the article or to send so much money in payment for it. That is the customary way in which such business is done.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think this is an extremely desirable piece of legislation. I think the way this business has been worked up in this country is a nuisance, almost a curse; and I hope some such legislation as this can be enacted to put a stop to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL MUSEUM OF ENGINEERING AND INDUSTRY

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a commission on a national museum of engineering and industry was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this joint resolution was included in the House economy bill and in the bill which passed the Senate. I therefore think the joint resolution might be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

BILL AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 166) to print the pamphlets entitled "Draft of Mooney-Billings Report" and "Appendix Containing Official Documents," was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION SCHOOL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3323) to provide funds for cooperation with the school district at Nespelem, Wash., in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Colville Indian Reservation.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, when this bill came up some weeks ago on the Calendar the Senator from Pennsylvania raised some objection and asked some questions as to the amount of money provided, $75,000, and suggested that that was too large an amount. While I still think it is the proper amount, I recognize that there is some merit in the objection, and I should like to offer an amendment to strike out, in line 5, "$75,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$50,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the board of the public-school district at Nespelem, Wash., for construction and equipment of a public-school building: Provided, That the expenditure of any money so appropriated shall be subject to the condition that the school maintained by said school district shall be available to all Indian children upon the same terms and conditions as are afforded other children of the district, except that tuition may be paid for attendance of said Indian children in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

BOARD OF INDETERMINATE SENTENCE AND PAROLE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1155), to establish a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my understanding is that this bill received consideration a few days ago.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, one objection was raised, the objection being that it was thought the bill might create additional offices and result in additional expense to the District of Columbia.

I have just received a letter from Major Donovan, the auditor of the District of Columbia, in reply to my inquiry as to whether there would be any new positions created, or any additional cost, and he makes the statement positively that it would mean no additional cost to the District of Columbia or to the Federal Government, and, furthermore, that both the Federal Government and the District government hope the bill will pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendments of the committee in their order.

The amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia were, on page 2, line 1, after the word "for," to strike out "one year, one for two years, and one for three years" and insert "three years, one for five years, and one for seven years"; in line 5, after the words "term of," to strike out "three" and insert "seven"; in line 10, after the word "the," to strike out "alienist" and insert "psychiatrist"; on page 3, line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "said parole officers" and insert "each such parole officer"; on page 3, line 17, after "SEC. 3," to strike out:

That hereafter, in imposing sentence on prisoners convicted in the District of Columbia of crime or an offense against the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia, the justice or judge of the court imposing such sentence shall sentence the prisoners for the maximum period, not exceeding the maximum fixed by law, and for the minimum period not exceeding one-fifth of the maximum period fixed by law, and any prisoner so convicted and sentenced may be released on parole as herein provided at any time after having served six months of his sentence and after having served the minimum sentence.

That hereafter, in imposing sentence on a person convicted in the District of Columbia of a felony, the justice or judge of the court imposing such sentence shall sentence the person for a maximum period, not exceeding the maximum fixed by law, and for a minimum period not exceeding one-fifth of the maximum period fixed by law, and any person so convicted and sentenced may be released on parole as herein provided at any time after having served the minimum sentence.

On page 4, line 20, after the word "whenever," to insert a comma and "within the limitations of section 3 of this act"; on page 5, line 7, after the word "authorize," to strike out "and" and insert "the"; in the same line, before the word "such," to insert "of"; on page 5, after line 20, to strike out:

SEC. 5. That if the superintendent of penal institution from which a prisoner shall have been paroled, or said board of indeterminate sentence and parole or any member thereof, shall have reliable information that the prisoner has violated his or her parole, then in the event that the prisoner shall be beyond the bounds of the District of Columbia, on application of the said superintendent of said penal institution the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, at any time within the term or terms of the prisoner's sentence, shall issue a warrant to any Federal officer authorized to serve Federal process within the District of Columbia, and the officer to whom such warrant shall be delivered is authorized, empowered, and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner wherever he may be found, and returning him to the penal institution from which he was paroled.

SEC. 5. If said board of indeterminate sentence and parole, or any member thereof, shall have reliable information that a prisoner has violated his parole, said board, or any member thereof, at any time within the term or terms of the prisoner's sentence, may issue a warrant to any officer hereinafter authorized to execute the same for the retaking of such prisoner. Any officer of the penal institution from which such prisoner shall have been paroled or any Federal officer authorized to serve criminal process within the United States to whom such warrant shall be delivered is authorized and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner and returning him to said penal institution.

On page 7, line 6, after the word "thereof," to insert:

And if such order of parole be revoked and the parole so terminated the said prisoner shall serve the remainder of the sentence originally imposed, the unexpired term of imprisonment of any such prisoner to begin to run from the date he is returned to the institution, and time the prisoner was out on parole shall not be taken into account to diminish the time for which he was sentenced.

In line 15, after the word "advisable," and the period to strike out:

(If such order of parole be revoked and the parole so terminated, the said prisoner shall serve the remainder of the sentence originally imposed, and the time for which he was sentenced.)

At the top of page 8, to strike out:

SEC. 8. Upon the appointment of the members of said board, the powers of the existing parole board over prisoners confined in the institutions of the District of Columbia, or at Occoquan, or Lorton, shall cease and determine.

On page 8, after line 5, to insert the following section:

SEC. 8. Any person confined in a penal institution of the District of Columbia who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, or any person who procures, advises, connives at, aids, or assists in such escape, or conceals any such prisoner after such escape, shall be guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, said sentence to begin, if the convicted person be an escaped prisoner, upon the expiration of the original sentence.

And on page 8, after line 14, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 9. Upon the appointment of the members of said board, the powers of the existing parole board over prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall cease and determine and all the powers of said existing parole board under the authority of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," as amended, over said prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall be transferred to and vested in said board of indeterminate sentence and parole: Provided, however, That in the case of a prisoner convicted of felony committed prior to the effective date of this act, and in the case of any prisoner convicted of misdemeanor when the aggregate sentence imposed is in excess of one year, said board of indeterminate sentence and parole may parole said prisoner, under the provisions of this act, after said prisoner has served one-fifth of the sentence imposed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the penal institutions for said District, to consist of 3 members, residents of said District, to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, none of which members shall be officially connected with the prison administration in any other capacity; that of the 3 members first appointed after the passage of this act, 1 shall be appointed for 3 years, 1 for 5 years, and 1 for 7 years; thereafter all appointments, except such as may be made for the remainder of unexpired terms, shall be for the term of 7 years. It shall be the duty of the board of indeterminate sentence and parole to examine into the physical, mental, and moral records of the prisoners committed to the penal institutions of the District; receive reports of wardens and other officials, including the psychiatrist; recommend the treatment which, in their opinion, is most conducive to the prisoners' reformation; and provide for a system of determining the proper time of release and the rehabilitation of the ex-prisoner in the community. The board shall adopt rules and regulations for its procedure, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The members of the board shall serve without compensation: Provided, That actual and necessary traveling expenses of the members of the board, incurred in the performance of duties under this act, shall be allowed and paid as herein provided.

SEC. 2. The board of indeterminate sentence and parole shall, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, appoint parole officers, in such number as shall be approved by Congress from time to time, for the penal institutions of said District, one of whom shall also act as the clerk of said board of indeterminate sentence and parole. It shall be the duty of such officers, subject to the discretion and control of said board, to perform such duties and exercise such authority as the said board may direct. Salaries and the actual and necessary traveling expenses of each such parole officer shall be paid out of the appropriation for the maintenance of the penal institution to which he is assigned and receive compensation in accordance with the rates established by the personnel classification act of 1923. (All other necessary expenses incurred in the administration of this act shall be paid out of the appropriations for the penal institutions from which prisoners are paroled, and such appropriations are hereby made available therefor.)

SEC. 3. That hereafter, in imposing sentence on a person convicted in the District of Columbia of a felony, the justice or judge of the court imposing such sentence shall sentence the person for maximum period, not exceeding the maximum fixed by law, and for a minimum period not exceeding one-fifth of the maximum period fixed by law, and any person so convicted and sentenced may be released on parole as herein provided at any time after having served the minimum sentence: Provided, however, That this act shall not abrogate the power of the justice or judge to sentence a convicted prisoner to the death penalty as now or hereafter may be provided by law: Provided further, That where a justice or a judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has imposed a life sentence on the prisoner convicted in the District of Columbia, said prisoner serving such sentence shall be eligible to parole as herein provided at any time after having served 15 years of his life's sentence.

SEC. 4. That whenever, within the limitations of section 3 of this act, it shall appear to the board of indeterminate sentence and parole, from the reports of the prisoner's work and conduct which may be received in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed, and from the study and examination made by the board itself, that any prisoner serving an indeterminate sentence is fitted by his training for release, that there is a reasonable probability that such a prisoner will live and remain at liberty without violating the law, and in the opinion of the board such release is not incompatible with the welfare of society, said board of indeterminate sentence and parole may, in its discretion, authorize the release of such prisoner on parole, and he shall be allowed to go on parole, outside of said prison, and in the discretion of the board to return to his home upon such terms and conditions, including personal reports from said paroled prisoner, as said board of indeterminate sentence and parole shall prescribe, and to remain, while on parole, in the legal custody and under the control of the superintendent of the institution from which the prisoner may have been paroled, until the expiration of the maximum of the term or terms specified in his sentence, less such good-time allowance as is, or may hereinafter be, provided by law; and the said board shall in every parole fix the limits of the residence of such person paroled, which limits, however, may be thereafter changed in the discretion of the board.

SEC. 5. If said board of indeterminate sentence and parole, or any member thereof, shall have reliable information that a prisoner has violated his parole, said board, or any member thereof, at any time within the term or terms of the prisoner's sentence, may issue a warrant to any officer hereinafter authorized to execute the same for the retaking of such prisoner. Any officer of the penal institution from which such prisoner shall have been paroled or any Federal officer authorized to serve criminal process within the United States to whom such warrant shall be delivered is authorized and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner and returning him to said penal institution.

SEC. 6. At the next meeting of the board of indeterminate sentence and parole held after the issuing of a warrant for the retaking of any paroled prisoner, said board shall be notified thereof, and if such prisoner shall have been returned to the institution, he shall be given an opportunity to appear before said board of indeterminate sentence and parole, and the said board may then, or at any time in its discretion, revoke the order and terminate such parole or modify the terms and conditions thereof, and if such order of parole be revoked and the parole so terminated the said prisoner shall serve the remainder of the sentence originally imposed, the unexpired term of imprisonment of any such prisoner to begin to run from the date he is returned to the institution, and time the prisoner was out on parole shall not be taken into account to diminish the time for which he was sentenced: Provided, That the parole board, at its discretion, may afterwards grant a new parole to said prisoner, in the event said board should deem it advisable.

SEC. 7. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of the act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That for any felony committed before this act takes effect, the penalty, sentence, or forfeiture provided by law for such felony at the time such felony was committed shall remain in full force and effect and shall be imposed, notwithstanding this act.

SEC. 8. Any person confined in a penal institution of the District of Columbia who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, or any person who procures, advises, connives at, aids, or assists in such escape, or conceals any such prisoner after such escape, shall be guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, said sentence to begin, if the convicted person be an escaped prisoner, upon the expiration of the original sentence.

SEC. 9. Upon the appointment of the members of said board, the powers of the existing parole board over prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall cease and determine and all the powers of said existing parole board under the authority of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," as amended, over said prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall be transferred to and vested in said board of indeterminate sentence and parole: Provided, however, That in the case of a prisoner convicted of felony committed prior to the effective date of this act, and in the case of any prisoner convicted of misdemeanor when the aggregate sentence imposed is in excess of one year, said board of indeterminate sentence and parole may parole said prisoner, under the provisions of this act, after said prisoner has served one-fifth of the sentence imposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] offered an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 7, the Senator from Tennessee proposes to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

SEC. 2. Title IV of the merchant marine act, 1928, shall not be construed to authorize ocean mail contracts for routes between continental United States and (a) the Virgin Islands or (b) Panama or the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in order that this bill may be enacted at the present session, it will have to be acted on to-day. It is of very small consequence, merely authorizing a ship to stop at the Virgin Islands under the circumstances indicated in the title of the measure.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has presented an amendment. Can not the Senator eliminate the latter part of this amendment, relating to the Panama Canal, and make his amendment solely applicable to the particular stoppage at the Virgin Islands?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will eliminate that part of the amendment, in order that the bill may be acted upon at this session of Congress, I will accept his amendment.

REGULATION OF USE OF DANGEROUS WEAPONS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8754) to control the possession, sale, transfer, and use of pistols and other dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia, to provide penalties, to prescribe rules of evidence, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whoever is the author of the bill or whoever reported it I hope will give some explanation.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this is a House bill, but had very careful consideration by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. The bill also has the very strong approval of the police department of the District of Columbia, of the District Commissioners, and of the civic organizations.

Under the terms of the bill the purchaser of a pistol would be required to sign in duplicate and give the dealer a statement containing his name, his address, his occupation, and other pertinent information. The sale would not be consummated until 48 hours after the application was made.

The right of an individual to possess a pistol in his home or on land belonging to him would not be disturbed by the bill. As it is now all types of deadly weapons are sold in the District of Columbia with virtually no restriction. The District authorities and everyone here who has anything to do with the Government and the administration of the law strongly favor this measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, section 1, line 5, after the word "length," to strike out "or any weapon commonly designated as a sawed-off shotgun regardless of length" and insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Sawed-off shotgun," as used in this act, means any shotgun with a barrel less than 20 inches in length.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 6, line 16, after the word "gun," to insert "sawed-off shotgun"; on page 7, line 1, after the words "machine gun," to insert "sawed-off shotgun"; in line 6, after the words "machine gun," to insert "sawed-off shotgun"; in line 13, after the word "guns," to insert "sawed-off shotguns"; on page 8, line 4, after the word "gun," insert "sawed-off shotgun"; in line 12, after the word "all," strike out the words "pistols and" and insert the word "pistols"; and after the words "machine guns," in line 12, insert the words "and sawed-off shotguns"; in line 18, after the words "machine guns," insert "sawed-off shotgun"; on page 9, in line 16, after the words "machine gun," insert "sawed-off shotgun"; in line 23, after the word "any," strike out "pistol or" and insert "pistol," and after the words "machine gun" insert "or sawed-off shotgun"; in line 24, after the word "any," strike out "pistol or" and insert "pistol"; on page 10, line 1, after the word "gun," insert "or sawed-off shotgun"; in line 20, after the words "machine guns," insert the words "sawed-off shotguns"; and in line 21, after the word "by," strike out "any foreign government," so as to make the bill read:

SEC. 6. The superintendent of police of the District of Columbia may, upon the application of any person having a bona fide residence or place of business within the District of Columbia or of any person having a bona fide residence or place of business within the United States and a license to carry a pistol concealed upon his person issued by the lawful authorities of any State or subdivision of the United States, issue a license to such person to carry a pistol within the District of Columbia for not more than one year from date of issue, if it appears that the applicant has good reason to fear injury to his person or property or has any other proper reason for carrying a pistol and that he is a suitable person to be so licensed. The license shall be in duplicate, in form to be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall bear the name, address, description, photograph, and signature of the licensee and the reason given for desiring a license. The original thereof shall be delivered to the licensee, and the duplicate shall be retained by the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia and preserved in his office for six years.

SELLING TO MINORS AND OTHERS

SEC. 7. No person shall within the District of Columbia sell any pistol to a person who he has reasonable cause to believe is not of sound mind, or is a drug addict, or is a person who has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence or, except when the relation of parent and child or guardian and ward exists, is under the age of 18 years.

TRANSFERS REGULATED

SEC. 8. No seller shall within the District of Columbia deliver a pistol to the purchaser thereof until 48 hours shall have elapsed from the time of the application for the purchase thereof, except in the case of sales to marshals, sheriffs, prison or jail wardens or their deputies, policemen, or other duly appointed law-enforcement officers, and, when delivered, said pistol shall be securely wrapped and shall be unloaded. At the time of applying for the purchase of a pistol the purchaser shall sign in duplicate and deliver to the seller a statement containing his full name, address, occupation, color, place of birth, the date and hour of application, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of the pistol to be purchased, and a statement that he has never been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence. The seller shall, within six hours after such application, sign and attach his address and deliver one copy to such person or persons as the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia may designate, and shall retain the other copy for six years. No machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or blackjack shall be sold to any person other than the persons designated in section 14 hereof as entitled to possess the same, and then only after permission to make such sale has been obtained from the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia. This section shall not apply to sales at wholesale to licensed dealers.

DEALERS TO BE LICENSED

SEC. 9. No retail dealer shall within the District of Columbia sell or expose for sale or have in his possession, with intent to sell, any pistol, machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or blackjack without being licensed as hereinafter provided. No wholesale dealer shall, within the District of Columbia, sell, or have in his possession with intent to sell, to any person other than a licensed dealer, any pistol, machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or blackjack.

DEALERS' LICENSES, BY WHOM GRANTED AND CONDITIONS THEREOF

SEC. 10. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, grant licenses and may prescribe the form thereof, effective for not more than one year from date of issue, permitting the licensee to sell pistols, machine guns, sawed-off shotguns, and blackjacks at retail within the District of Columbia subject to the following conditions in addition to those specified in section 9 hereof, for breach of any of which the license shall be subject to forfeiture and the licensee subject to punishment as provided in this act.

1. The business shall be carried on only in the building designated in the license.

2. The license or a copy thereof, certified by the issuing authority, shall be displayed on the premises where it can be easily read.

3. No pistol shall be sold (a) if the seller has reasonable cause to believe that the purchaser is not of sound mind or is a drug addict or has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence or is under the age of 18 years, and (b) unless the purchaser is personally known to the seller or shall present clear evidence of his identity. No machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or blackjack shall be sold to any person other than the persons designated in section 14 hereof as entitled to possess the same, and then only after permission to make such sale has been obtained from the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia.

4. A true record shall be made in a book kept for the purpose, the form of which may be prescribed by the commissioners, of all pistols, machine guns, and sawed-off shotguns in the possession of the licensee, which said record shall contain the date of purchase, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of the weapon, to which shall be added, when sold, the date of sale.

5. A true record in duplicate shall be made of every pistol, machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, and blackjack sold, said record to be made in a book kept for the purpose, the form of which may be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and shall be personally signed by the purchaser and by the person effecting the sale, each in the presence of the other, and shall contain the date of sale, the name, address, occupation, color, and place of birth of the purchaser, and, so far as applicable, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of the weapon, and a statement signed by the purchaser that he has never been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence. One copy of said record shall, within seven days, be forwarded by mail to the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia and the other copy retained by the seller for six years.

6. No pistol or imitation thereof or placard advertising the sale thereof shall be displayed in any part of said premises where it can readily be seen from the outside. No license to sell at retail shall be granted to anyone except as provided in this section.

FALSE INFORMATION FORBIDDEN

SEC. 11. No person shall, in purchasing a pistol or in applying for a license to carry the same, or in purchasing a machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or blackjack within the District of Columbia, give false information or offer false evidence of his identity.

ALTERATION OF IDENTIFYING MARKS PROHIBITED

SEC. 12. No person shall within the District of Columbia change, alter, remove, or obliterate the name of the maker, model, manufacturer's number, or other mark or identification on any pistol, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun. Possession of any pistol, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun upon which any such mark shall have been changed, altered, removed, or obliterated shall be prima facie evidence that the possessor has changed, altered, removed, or obliterated the same within the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to any officer or agent of any of the departments of the United States or the District of Columbia engaged in experimental work.

PENALTIES

SEC. 15. Any violation of any provision of this act for which no penalty is specifically provided shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

So Mr. BROOKHART's motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has offered the following amendment:

On page 1, line 9, strike out the word "in" and insert the words "discharged from," so as to read:

Resolved, That so much of paragraph 1 of Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate as reads "Committee on Pensions, to consist of 11 Senators" is amended to read as follows:

"Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of 13 Senators, to which shall be referred all legislation and other matters relating to pensions, Government life insurance, and death or disability compensation, hospitalization, and allowances of persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and their beneficiaries, and all legislation and others matters relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and its branches."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think that is not the resolution which is before the Senate. I do not have it here in that form.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair state that in the RECORD for April 25, on page 8858, will be found the proceedings wherein the Senator from Iowa is recorded as having offered the amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to perfect the resolution now in line 9 by striking out the word "in" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "discharged from."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the amendment which has just been agreed to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then that leaves the resolution as I desire it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I inquire of the Senator whether it is the expectation that the Committee on Pensions will become the Committee on Veterans' Affairs or that a committee de novo shall be chosen?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is expected that a committee de novo will be chosen; that a new committee will be created by this resolution entirely. There is nothing in it transferring the personnel of any existing committee, or anything of that kind.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If that is the fact, since the committee memberships are normally rearranged at the beginning of a session, and since we are now practically at the close of the present session, I am wondering whether the Senator would object to amendment in line 1 so that the resolution would read:

Resolved, That at the opening of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress, and thereafter, so much of paragraph 1—

And so forth.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think the committee ought to be organized now and not wait for any reorganization at the beginning of the next session, because there may be some legislation proposed relating to veterans' affairs that should have consideration during the interim. I have no particular objection; there will probably be nothing brought forward at this session; but I think we ought not postpone the organization of the committee in the way suggested.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My understanding, from discussing the matter with the Senator a few moments ago, was that his original attitude was not one of hostility to the idea suggested by me.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is correct. But after conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and others, it was thought advisable not to do that. That conversation took place since the one with the Senator from Michigan a while ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, inasmuch as it seems to me that this would be the orderly way to proceed, I will take the liberty of offering, if the Senator will permit me in his time to raise the question——

Mr. BROOKHART. I would prefer that the Senator wait until I make my statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as Congress has already provided for the Veterans' Administration to include all activities with reference to soldiers' relief, I wondered whether the Senator had considered the advisability of having one committee of the Senate to consider all such legislation?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is exactly what the pending resolution provides.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does it in fact abolish the old Pensions Committee and create a new one?

Mr. BROOKHART. It abolishes the old Pensions Committee and transfers its jurisdiction and that of the Finance Committee and of any other committee now considering veterans' matters to the proposed new committee, so that all legislation regarding veterans' affairs will be considered by the new committee. I will say to the Senator that there are some 200 bills now pending in the Finance Committee that have not been considered at this session of Congress, and I believe only 4 have been considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that. Being a member of the Finance Committee, and having had bills of my own before it which I found some difficulty occasionally in having considered by the committee, I have sympathy with the purpose of the Senator's resolution; but I was anxious to know whether it covered the point about which I inquired.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is exactly the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In line 5, I note that the committee is to consist of 13 members. Many people have an aversion to the cabalistic number 13. I have no such aversion, but I move that the membership of the committee be increased to 15.

Mr. BROOKHART. The size of the committee is immaterial to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that there is pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well, I withdraw my amendment for the moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. REED. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that only four bills relating to veterans have been reported by the Finance Committee at this session?

Mr. BROOKHART. That was the information that came to me. I myself did not secure the information from the committee.

Mr. REED. My impression is that about 80 or 90 bills have been acted upon by the Finance Committee and reported to the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. I refer the question to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING].

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, the figures I have, may I say to the Senator from Iowa, show that up to May 16—I have not the figures since then—there had been 168 bills referred to the Finance Committee. Of these bills 39 were reported adversely without hearing, 11 were reported adversely by the committee and subsequently recommitted to the committee, 2 were tabled in the committee, on 110 bills the committee has taken no action, and on just 6 has favorable action been taken. One of the six was the bill which was reported favorably to the Senate only after a long fight by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and two of the remaining five were bills to which the service men were practically unanimously opposed. The record may have changed somewhat since the 16th of May, but I think the figures submitted by me speak for themselves.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell me who compiled these figures?

Mr. CUTTING. They are based on the committee's Calendar No. 10 of May 16, 1932, sent to me by the American Legion.

Mr. REED. My impression is that at least a half dozen bills were reported favorably or acted upon favorably that do not come within the category the Senator has just given. I remember I had, I think, two to report favorably; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] had a couple, as I remember; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] had two or three; and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] had some. I think there must be some error in the statement.

Mr. CUTTING. Possibly they were reported since the 16th of May. Does the Senator remember as to that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I was fortunate to have one bill reported favorably by the Committee on Finance, which has been on the calendar for several months, and it would have passed except for the objection of members of the Finance Committee who were not in favor of it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Michigan that the fact which the Senator from New Mexico states affords some indication that the committee ought to be organized now rather than to have reorganization wait until the next session.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator will allow me to say so, I hope he will not accept the amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. For the reasons indicated, I think I shall not accept the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator accept the amendment I desire to propose and which I mentioned a few moments ago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say it is not a question of a Senator accepting an amendment. The resolution is formally before the Senate and any amendment may be offered.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Chair; I would not have known that if the Chair had not told me.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am not going to take any time in presenting this matter. I desire to bring it to a vote at once. The resolution in its present form has the approval of the American Legion and all the veterans' organizations. There is no division of opinion any longer about what should be done or the form which the resolution should take. Therefore, I submit the resolution for a vote at once.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in my colloquy with the Senator from Iowa we were discussing the advisability of postponing the reorganization of this committee until the second session of the Seventy-second Congress. I find that my suggestion might have been interpreted as a reflection upon the membership of the present Pensions Committee, which, of course, was the farthest thing from my thought. So far as I am concerned the personnel of that committee is quite as adequate and satisfactory as any other. My sole theory is that, particularly if the committee is to be increased in size—and I cordially concur in that suggestion—there is bound to be further delay respecting the reorganization of the new committee in its new and amplified status. The net result will be that we shall have, if anything, a hiatus during which there will be no fully organized committee to carry on, and I am unable to see that my suggested amendment would be contributing in any degree to delay in the consideration of veterans' legislation. At any rate, for the purpose of taking the judgment of the Senate, I move that in line 1, after the word "That," the following words be inserted:

At the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress and thereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. REED. It occurs to me that the change proposed by the Senator from Michigan is a wise one unless it is in the minds of the advocates of the resolution to make special provision for handling the bonus bill, if it should pass the House. I wish the Senator from Iowa would tell us if that is his reason for opposing the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I gave my reason for opposing the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. This resolution was pending during the last session and it has been pending all through this session. The bonus bill has not been a special matter in contemplation of this resolution at all. So the only reason I have is the one already given.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Michigan will yield again, the Senator from Iowa said that all the veterans' organizations were of one mind. The Senator surely does not mean that the American Legion is in favor of the bonus bill, does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. This resolution does not relate to the bonus bill or any other bill; it relates to the appointment of a committee to consider all veterans' legislation; and if the bonus bill should come over here it ought to be considered the same as any other measure; there is no question about that.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is it not the Senator's real reason for opposing the motion of the Senator from Michigan that he wants to have a special committee handle the bonus bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have told the Senator twice what the real reason was, and I can not make it any plainer than by what I have said. I want this resolution adopted in order that a committee may be created to consider all veterans' affairs.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, although in the other body there has been a special veterans' committee in existence for years, that committee did not consider the proposed bonus legislation which is now on the calendar for action in the House. It was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, because it involved a matter of revenue in the form of bonds and some other features which required consideration by the revenue-raising committee in the other body. Whether that would be the rule here I do not know, but it does not follow necessarily that because of this resolution will take effect at once or be postponed until next December that it will have anything to do with the proposed bonus legislation.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will yield to me further, this resolution provides that "all legislation and other matters relating to pensions, Government life insurance, and death or disability, compensation, hospitalization, and allowances of persons in the military or naval service of the United States," and so forth, shall be referred to the proposed new committee. Would not that include the bonus bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. I, myself, am not certain about that, because unless the word "allowances" would cover it none of the other phrases in the resolution would include the bonus bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is a bridge the Senate will cross when it comes. It will have authority to refer that bill where it pleases, regardless of what my opinion might be with reference to it.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us what his opinion is?

Mr. BROOKHART. My opinion is that it should be considered by the proposed veterans' committee.

Mr. REED. That the bonus bill providing for a bond issue now pending in the House should go to that committee?

Mr. BROOKHART. There would not be any reason why it should not also be referred to the Finance Committee to consider the bond issue proposal, but the question of whether the bonus should be allowed would be one for the veterans' committee, just the same as a question involving the Army or the Navy would go to one of those committees, although there may be some financial matters that would go to the Finance Committee.

Mr. REED. The House has a Veterans' Committee, and it did not refer the bonus bill to that committee at all.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have not examined the details of the House proceedings, and do not know what their reasons were. I paid no attention to that in any way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The whole purpose of this resolution, I think, is well known to the Senator from Pennsylvania. The American Legion is back of the resolution, and has been from the beginning. The reason why the American Legion and other soldier organizations are back of the resolution is because those organizations have seen legislation in which the service men of the country have been interested pigeonholed in the Finance Committee.

I do not claim that anyone is particularly to blame. That committee has a tremendous amount of work to do; but the fact remains that the legislation has been pigeonholed, and it has never seen the light of day. The statistics just suggested by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico are certainly enlightening on that score.

I do not see where the colloquy that is going on just at this moment has anything particularly to do with this resolution, which has lain here month after month and month after month; and now the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Iowa seek to get some action on it.

The whole purpose of the resolution is plain. It has nothing in the world to do with any particular piece of legislation, as the Senator from Pennsylvania must well know, but it is here because of the fact that we can get no action from that committee, burdened as I understand it is, and probably is, with very great matters; and it is burdened now with some additional matters involving the raising of an additional $200,000,000 to balance the Budget, which I supposed was balanced. So it seems to me it is high time that we pay some heed to those men who, wearing the uniform in defense of their country, made possible the country's prosperity up until 1929, and who are in no wise responsible in the slightest degree for the depressing conditions that surround us now on all sides.

It is certainly high time that these men, who have been patient, and who have waited throughout the years, have a committee at least to consider legislation—all legislation; not one piece of legislation, but all legislation—in which they are interested, so that it may at least find its way to the floor of the Senate, that the Senate may vote upon it. That is the whole purpose of the legislation changing the committee which has been proposed; and, of course, the Senator from Pennsylvania, brilliant as he is—and we all concede his brilliancy and his intelligence and his patriotism and his anxiety to be of service to his country—must know something about this resolution that has been before the Senate throughout all these months.

I beg the Senator's pardon for taking so much of his time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, those are my sentiments exactly; and I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me, in his time, to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Indiana is one of the foremost friends of the veterans in Congress. Although we are spending a billion dollars a year for the veterans of the last war—and it is evident, therefore, that some bills must have come out of the Finance Committee—yet the Senator doubtless would like to have those appropriations very much increased. We all understand that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am not talking about appropriations. I have not any idea who is responsible for newspaper reports that I have read recently to the effect that criticism has been leveled at General Glassford, the efficient chief of police in this city, for feeding these lads who happen to be here.

Mr. REED. This resolution has nothing to do with that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think it is utterly outrageous that any man in either House of Congress should criticize this efficient public officer for doing the thing which, of course, he should do. What would these Congressman who are his critics have him do—let the veterans starve to death?

Only yesterday, Mr. President, they were marching down Pennsylvania Avenue, acclaimed by the populace as heroes. They were going over yonder, and 2,000,000 of them did go, and we left some 60,000 of them there who to-day sleep under the sod and the dew there. When the survivors came back they were greeted on all sides with the statement, "You can have anything you want." To-day all they want is a job. Proud men they are, spirited men, men who are maimed and broken in body, and many of them in mind. Now, here they are, not because they want to be here. They are too proud to want to be here, but they want jobs from a great government, a grateful government for which they offered their lives, and for which many of their comrades gave their lives. That is one thing I suggest as I criticize much that has been said recently.

This resolution has nothing whatever to do with possible additional appropriations. It simply seeks to serve the veterans of the country. But I say these men are entitled to special consideration, and that has been written into the law of this country, so that it has become an American policy, that they should have special consideration. If there are any jobs to be found, for God's sake let us give them the jobs. We have got to give them jobs or we have got to give them money with which to buy food. I am for that. If that be treason, let the Senator from Pennsylvania make the most of it. I am for considering all their bills as rapidly as they come here; and I am anxious to see a committee in the Senate function with those bills and, as rapidly as they come, take them up and let the Senate vote them up or down.

I hope that answers the Senator's question. Those are my sentiments. I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. REED. That does not begin to answer my question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well, then. What is the question, specifically, and I will try to answer it?

Mr. REED. The Senator, if he would wait to hear the question, doubtless would answer it responsively. The Senator is shaking his gory locks at me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not gory, I hope. I hope not, at any rate. I hope the Senator and I will not let this colloquy go to such an extent that either of us may become gory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Go ahead.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it goes on much longer, we will all grow hoary. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Indiana denounces those who have criticized General Glassford. I have not criticized him. I admire him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Nor did I say the Senator from Pennsylvania had criticized him; but I said I had read in the newspapers that Members of both Houses of Congress quietly—their names were not given—had criticized him.

Mr. REED. Yes; the Senator said that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I did not say the Senator from Pennsylvania had.

Mr. REED. While the Senator was saying that Members of Congress had criticized General Glassford, he was shaking his fist at me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in order to pour oil on the troubled waters, I will resume the floor myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky declines further to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to say anything that would in any way cast any reflection upon the efficiency or good faith of the Committee on Finance in dealing with veterans' legislation; but I think we all can admit that of all the committees in the Senate the Finance Committee is the one that ought not logically to have jurisdiction of veterans' legislation.

I recall that during the war what was known as the war risk insurance act was passed, dealing with commerce between this country and other countries, providing for Government insurance of cargoes that could not obtain insurance otherwise. Later on, when we passed the veterans' act, it was an amendment to the war risk insurance act, which had been reported out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House; and for years the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce retained jurisdiction over all veterans' legislation merely by the accidental fact that it had reported out a really commercial act during the war.

Several years ago the House changed that anomalous situation and created a Committee on Veterans' Legislation. I do not know just how the Finance Committee happened to get jurisdiction of veterans' legislation in the Senate, because it already had it before I became a Member of this body; but it seems to me it is just as incongruous a situation for the Finance Committee of the Senate to have jurisdiction of this legislation as it was in the other body for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to have it.

I am very much in favor of the resolution, and hope it will be agreed to, and that a committee will be appointed that can deal with this legislation on its merits and not between meals, when it has nothing else to do on the subject of other legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question before he yields the floor?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. REED. As the Senator knows, we are now spending about $1,000,000,000—a thousand million dollars—a year for veterans' relief. We have given more generously to our veterans than any nation in the world ever did at any time in history. That takes 25 per cent of the entire National Budget of the Federal Treasury. Ought it not to be the Finance Committee, which has to plan for raising that money by taxation, that has charge of these bills for pouring out the money to the veterans?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not any more than it ought to be the duty of the Finance Committee to report appropriation bills. We have to raise money by taxation, through bills brought here by the Finance Committee, for all the expenses of the Government; and if the Senator's suggestion held good in the matter of veterans' legislation it would be equally logical with reference to all appropriation bills. But, of course, we do not do that; and I doubt seriously whether it really is the function of the tax-paying committee to be the appropriating committee. I think there ought to be a balance between the raising of money and the expenditure of money that could not be brought about if the same committee dealt with both subjects.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to perfect my amendment by withdrawing the previous language and submitting it in the following form:

Amend the resolution, in line 3, after the word "amended," by inserting a comma and the words "effective at the opening of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

SEVERAL SENATORS Vote! Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know why the hurry with reference to this proposal. The matter has been before the Senate for some time and the Senator who offered the resolution has been given every opportunity to present his views before the regular committee of the Senate having jurisdiction of the matter.

The Committee on Rules gave consideration to this subject on at least two occasions, and in doing so they went fully into the question whether or not public business would be expedited by the adoption of the resolution and whether or not there was need for such a change in the organization of the Senate.

In the committee I voted against the creation of a new committee, because I did not believe it was necessary; I did not believe that the committee now having this matter in charge had been derelict in its duty. I think there are few committees which have given more zealous consideration to measures affecting ex-service men and understand the subject better than the subcommittee which was appointed by the Finance Committee to study veterans' legislation. I can say that because I am not a member of the subcommittee on veterans' legislation, but I know the character of men who make up the personnel of that subcommittee. They have worked in season and out of season on the various proposals which have been introduced in the Congress relating to veterans' legislation, and when we review that record, notwithstanding the criticism of groups and individuals that we have not performed our duty to the ex-service men of the country, we must agree that as shown by the record, the Congress has been generous with reference to such legislation

We have expended millions and millions of dollars for hospitalization facilities to take care of the disabled soldiers. We have, through very generous legislation, provided for compensation disability allowance, and through insurance policies have made provision for taking care of the wives and dependents of soldiers in the event of death of veterans. We have liberalized the payment of the adjusted-service certificate. We have met the reasonable demands for soldiers' legislation.

No blush of shame should come to the face of any Member of the American Congress because of an accusation that he had been derelict of duty or failed to respond to the needs of the disabled soldier in the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will let me proceed for just a few minutes, because I am sure he has already occupied some time of the Senate, and there are only a few minutes left; and the Senator——

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is just using the time so that we will not get a vote. We have only five minutes in which to get a vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, have we come to the point in the American Senate when, on an important proposition like this, simply because one should voice disapproval of what is proposed to be done, and give, in a very humble way, his reasons why the proposed action should not be taken, he should be charged with delay?

Mr. President, this matter was presented only a few moments ago. The Senate was generous in voting, by a large vote, to discharge the committee, or perhaps it was done by unanimous consent—I do not know which course was pursued, as I happened to be out of the Chamber for the moment. But I hope the Senator will not seek to stop me from at least expressing my opinion about the resolution, because I know it has gotten to the point now when one who really expresses himself against any proposal intended to bring about any kind of legislation affecting the soldiers might be charged with un-Americanism and as doing something grossly wrong. So, if the Senator will just bide his time and let me express myself I will have finished shortly, because I never detain the Senate unduly.

Mr. President, if the Finance Committee had been negligent in its duty, if it had tried to strangle legislation, if it had not responded, as it has, by bill after bill, piling up a record that is magnificent in achievement in behalf of the ex-soldiers, then I would say there might be some reason for unhorsing the Finance Committee and placing this subject in the hands of some other committee.

These are times, Mr. President, when we can show our greater love for this country and this Government by trying to think along straight lines, and not be influenced by transient incidents. Within the next few days the Congress of the United States will have before it one of the greatest responsibilities it has ever faced. If we have the courage to try like men to steer this old Government in the right course—especially while threatening storms are upon us—we will not be influenced in the discharge of our duty.

I love the American soldier. I have never faltered in voting for any reasonable demand made by him. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that I have never hesitated in any matter affecting soldiers' relief. But if a million soldiers come to the great city of Washington and encamp around this Capitol and fill these corridors and these galleries they could not influence me when my Government is in the plight in which it is now, and when the American people are walking in the valley of despair and distress, to do those things which I think might destroy the credit of the country.

So far as I am concerned, it matters not what might be the effect upon my political career, I shall not vote for any immediate payment of soldiers' adjusted compensation at this particular time.

I can not believe that millions of the American ex-service men, who gave their all to preserve this Government and make the flag float triumphantly in the breeze, would have you and me do anything else if in the slightest it might destroy the high standing of this Government and affect its national credit.

The Government must be preserved, and in preserving it we will have no finer cooperation than from the brave and unselfish American soldier.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act approved June 15, 1929.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I believe that the American people can not stand additional taxes. I know how difficult it was to raise $1,200,000,000 in increased taxes. Yesterday the President stated that we might have to raise more. I ask Senators, as sensible men, not influenced by groups, do they believe that this Government to-day is in any financial condition to pay $2,400,000,000 compensation to World War veterans? If Senators think it is going to help the situation to start the printing presses and print money to give to them, if Senators think that will be good for the country, they had better look back and see what happened to Germany and some other countries which tried to inflate by merely printing money.

No, Mr. President; let us go along in an orderly way. These are exceptional times. So let us try to keep our heads. Let us try to maintain the national credit. Let us try to do those things which will hasten rather than halt a return of economic confidence. And in the end the American people and the American soldier will applaud our efforts. We can afford now to take criticism upon the chin, if in doing so we will best serve the country as a whole.

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT ON REDUCING APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, out of order I ask leave to introduce a resolution, to have it read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the Chair). The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 235) was read, as follows:

Whereas the President has announced that it is necessary to bring about a further reduction in the costs of government of approximately $200,000,000 or to levy additional taxes; and

Whereas the President with the assistance of the members of his cabinet and the heads of the independent offices and commissions is in better position within the short time before Congress adjourns to ascertain in what departments, bureaus, commissions, and independent offices such reduction can be brought about and how it may be done: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the President is requested to confer with the members of his cabinet and the heads of all bureaus, commissions, and independent offices, upon the best way to bring about said reduction in appropriations, and to submit to Congress for its consideration, specific suggestions covering each item that the President recommends as a suitable way and place to accomplish the proposed reduction of $200,000,000 in the appropriations for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], chairman of the Finance Committee, I will have to ask that the resolution may go over under the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama for that purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Johnson	Pittman
Austin	Couzens	Jones	Reed
Bankhead	Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Dale	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Barkley	Davis	King	Schall

Brookhart	George	McGill	Smoot

Bulow	Gore	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Byrnes	Hale	Morrison	Trammell

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SALES OF CERTAIN TAXABLE ARTICLES

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire the indulgence of the Senator from Arkansas to offer a unanimous-consent agreement and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the proposed agreement be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offers the following:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That in the consideration of any bill or joint resolution passed by the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress to amend section 625 of the revenue act approved June 6, 1932, relating to contracts made before May 1, 1932, no amendment shall be in order not germane to the said section or to said amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope that this order will be entered. There was an error made in section 625 which will have to be corrected or the Government will lose a considerable amount of revenue from that source. The only object is to prevent the offering of any amendments that are not germane to this particular matter in the event the House should pass a joint resolution and send it to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has stated the case for the unanimous-consent agreement. I understand that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] who offered the amendment has been consulted concerning it. I have consulted a number of Senators on both sides. The only desire is to remove the particular error in the section just referred to, section 625, and this is to assure that when a joint resolution comes over from the House it will not be made the vehicle for a number of amendments to the revenue act.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, it only applies to the one tax bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It only applies to section 625 of the revenue act of 1932.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator desires to make it impossible for the sales tax advocates to offer that amendment again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no particular amendment in mind.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It applies to all general amendments that may be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is entered into.

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT ON REDUCING APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I may have occasion to renew the request that was made a few moments ago for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] asked to go over under the rule. Manifestly, if the Senator from Pennsylvania sees fit to persist in his objection the resolution must be passed over under the rule.

Mr. President, it seems to me pertinent to state the provisions and purposes of the resolution. On yesterday, according to press reports, the President, having conferred with the majority members of the Finance Committee and of the so-called Economy Committee, authorized the statement that the Budget is still out of balance by an amount from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000, and that it will be necessary to bring about additional economies to those contemplated in the bill now in conference or to provide for taxes which will cover the additional amount of $150,000,000 or $200,000,000.

The Congress, and particularly the Senate, performed a remarkable act when it accepted, with some question, the figures supplied by the Treasury Department as to the additional revenues required to accomplish the thing about which there was general accord, namely, the balancing of the Budget. It will be recalled that early in the session the Treasury revised its estimates submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and announced that an additional sum of $450,000,000 would be required, conditions as alleged by the Treasury having changed since the time the first estimates were submitted about the beginning of the present session of Congress.

It will also be recalled that when the Senate Committee on Finance reported the revenue bill the Secretary of the Treasury announced that its passage in substantially the form in which reported and with the provisions then contained in it would accomplish the balancing of the Budget. After the Senate had proceeded for a little less than two weeks to deliberate on the measure, and most of the Senate committee amendments had been agreed to, when the Senate was ready to take a final vote on the measure the announcement came that an additional sum of about $280,000,000 would be required.

The Finance Committee took the suggestions under advisement and reported other amendments which, for the most part, were agreed to. The President himself, after conferring with a number of Senators, came down and delivered an address to the Senate in which he urged upon this body the importance of balancing the Budget, commended the Committee on Economy for its wise, prudent, and diligent action, and urged the Senate to support that committee. The Senate, continuing its labors, passed the economy bill within a very short time; but in the meantime certain amendments proposed by the Senate committee were eliminated or changed, resulting in a reduction of some $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 in the amount reported by the committee. It was stated here that at least one of the amendments resulting in that reduction was presented at the urgent request of the President himself; and, as everyone here recalls, the amendment referred to, the furlough amendment in substitution for the straight 10 per cent cut plan, was incorporated and the bill sent to conference. Of course everyone knew that the reductions resulting from the adoption of the amendment mentioned meant a disarrangement of the program which was in contemplation by the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Economy.

Now, while the bill is pending in conference, with the powers of the conference committee so limited that no new provision may be incorporated, the announcement is made that $150,000,000 or $200,000,000—the mere difference of $50,000,000 being so insignificant that it is not important to state which—is required to do what the Senate thought it was doing under the advice of the Treasury Department when it passed the revenue bill.

This resolution says to the President, "Please get the heads of your departments together; call them in for counsel; agree with them on reductions that can be made without great detriment to the service; then tell the Congress what specific recommendations you make in order to carry out the thought which you have in mind in order to balance the Budget. Do you desire the furlough amendment retained in the bill? Are you willing to accept the 10 per cent straight cut recommended by the Economy Committee? What items that were in the House bill, eliminated by the Senate committee and by the Senate, are you willing or desirous of accepting in order to balance the Budget; and what additional economies are possible from your study of the subject and from the study which your heads of departments have made? Tell the Senate something definite and something specific."

If the President will do that, we may hope that there is at last in sight the accomplishment of the purpose on which substantially everyone here is agreed. That purpose, however, can not be accomplished by undermining and rejecting the courageous action of a committee of this body cutting down the economies which it proposes, and then making a general suggestion that additional economies are required.

This is a fair resolution; it is an honest proposition; it is an earnest proposition. "Where do you recommend that the sums required shall be obtained? Where do you suggest that the executive departments, of which you are the supreme head, may reduce their expenditures in order that a proper relationship between the cost of government and the revenues for paying the same may be obtained?"

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have read the resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, and I have made some inquiry about the supposed announcement. I am told that the first recital is not correct, when it states that the President has announced that a further reduction of $200,000,000 is necessary. I am told that no such announcement has been made.

Apparently the impression grew out of the fact that the President had had a talk with certain members of the so-called Economy Committee, which reported out the economy addenda to the legislative appropriation bill, and the President seemed to have had some discussion with them as to how the shortages in the bill might be made up. It will be recalled that the bipartisan Economy Committee reported out an economy bill that did effect economies sufficient to provide the sums that the Finance Committee had said were necessary in order to balance the Budget in addition to the tax bill. On the floor of the Senate that economy bill was so slaughtered that in its present condition it does not raise the amount that that bipartisan committee set about to provide.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What amounts were eliminated?

Mr. REED. Some $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 were eliminated by substituting the furlough plan for the 10 per cent straight cut.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say that my understanding is that, instead of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, it was $40,000,000?

Mr. REED. I have heard different estimates; perhaps it was $40,000,000; I do not know. In addition to that, the Senate cut out $60,000,000 which was proposed to be saved in the expenditures of the Veterans' Bureau. Those were the two great slashes that were made here on the floor of the Senate. I take my share of the blame for the substitution of the furlough plan, because I voted for it, and correspondingly the Senator from Arkansas should, in all fairness, take his share of responsibility for voting to cut out all the veterans' items; and I think I recall that he did so vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I supported every amendment and recommendation submitted by the Economy Committee for the purpose of balancing the Budget and effectuating the saving necessary to accomplish that end until I saw the members of the majority party, including the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], desert their own measure and strike a blow at it by the incorporation of the furlough plan in the bill which they knew reduced the necessary revenues by somewhere between $20,000,000 and $40,000,000.

Mr. REED. Very good. Then, when the Senator saw that we——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not feel then that I should be expected to continue the sole champion of a measure brought in by the Economy Committee or that the Senator from Mississippi and I should be expected to stand as the sole champions of the bill while those directly responsible for the measure were deserting it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, perhaps it justifies the Senator's $60,000,000 mistake that I made a $20,000,000 mistake; I do not know as to that; but I am not a member of the economy committee, so I was not deserting my own committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; but the Senator is closely allied with the Finance Committee and knew the effect of the amendment that he was supporting. He knew that the Finance Committee bill—the revenue bill—was adopted on the theory that it would be followed by certain reductions in Government expenses afforded by the Economy Committee; he cut out those reductions and defeated the achievement of the purpose underlying the revenue bill.

Mr. REED. If I had known that the object lesson which I set was going to have such a deleterious effect on the behavior of the Senator from Arkansas I should have hesitated a long time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania ought not to expect a member of the minority to stand sponsor of an amendment which was of doubtful justice while he himself abandoned support of the proposal which underlay the main proposition. The main proposition was the balancing of the Budget. The Senator rose here the day before the revenue bill passed and sang a jeremiad that rang from limit to limit of the Nation, telling us of the woeful catastrophe which was impending and how necessary it was to raise $280,000,000 more. We said, "All right, we will support the proposal if you will just tell us how you propose it shall be done; just suggest how it can be done." The Finance Committee made the suggestion; we all understood that it was dependent in large upon carrying out the program reported by the Economy Committee; we saw the administration forces led by the Senator from Pennsylvania strike down that program; now they are here telling us that either additional taxes must be levied or more economies put into effect; and I am asking that the President stand sponsor for something definite. I am asking that he come into the open and say what he really stands for, what he proposes; and the Senator from Pennsylvania objects to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. REED. Inasmuch as the President has made no such announcement as the resolution recites, I feel it my duty to persist in the objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, throughout the country the press of yesterday carried the statement that the President had called to the White House the chairman of the Finance Committee, certain members of that committee, and the majority members of the Economy Committee.

President Hoover—

I am reading now—

President Hoover placed squarely before them the problem of making up the $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 by which Federal resources are variously estimated to fall short of expenditures. For more than an hour and a half they sat with the President and Budget Director J. Clawson Roop in the Lincoln study of the White House, discussing the problem brought about by failure of Senate economy bill savings and appropriation cuts to come up to expectations.

PROBLEM UP TO CONGRESS

Listen to this:

The problem of making good the deficit was left up to Congress, the President suggesting no detailed course of action to bring about the desired result. The conference, however, is understood definitely to have placed in the discard plans for adjournment within the next few days.

Further along in the article there is the statement that the furlough plan is to be retained.

I have been reading from the Washington Post of yesterday, which, let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, certainly would not intentionally err in attributing an act or a thought to the President.

I shall read now from the Washington Sunday Star:

At a hastily summoned conference at the White House last night, President Hoover revealed to four Republican conferees on the Government pay-cut section of the economy bill that the estimates for increased revenues from taxation and governmental economy will fall short between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 of balancing the Budget.

The President was represented as making it plain that he expects this deficiency to be taken care of.

In making the revelation as to the necessity for raising more revenue or engaging in more economy, President Hoover was represented as not specifically naming the extra deficit. The figure of $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 was arrived at by calculations made during the conference.

Omitting a part of the article:

Representative Wood, who acted as spokesman for the group when the White House conference was concluded, said that the Senate furlough-without-pay plan was not discussed at last night's conference.

Now the Senator from Pennsylvania declares that the President said no such thing. For all we know, the Budget is balanced. There is no need for additional revenue. For all we know, according to the Senator from Pennsylvania, there is no necessity for additional economy. Let me say now that there ought to be no occasion for concealment or for misrepresentation touching the facts that underlie this proposal.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Is not this a fine example of the results of attempting to balance the Budget or bring about legislation by conferences and reports through the newspapers, instead of official statements to the Congress itself?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the Senator from Washington is correct.

I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that the statements in these press reports are true. I think it would be a crime for one who sits up in the press gallery to write a story like that unless he believes it is true. We find these stories published, and now the spokesman of the administration says no such thing happened. This resolution asks for specific recommendations.

I have been criticized in many instances for manifesting willingness to carry out the recommendations of the Executive on this important subject, and here I have to fight and argue to find out what are the facts. If we pass this resolution, and ask the President for specific suggestions, I imagine, I hope he will send official recommendations to the Congress upon which we will be entitled to rely.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. I hope that through the resolution sponsored by the Senator from Arkansas we can get the considered judgment of Cabinet officers concerning methods of economizing. The Appropriations Committee of the Senate certainly failed to enjoy that cooperation; but in virtually every instance, when called upon for suggestions of ways to reduce expenditures, the Cabinet officer in question has said that his department could not suffer a reduction. Instead of enjoying their cooperation, we have had to overcome their opposition in virtually every case; and I hope the Senator has found a way at last through which they can be compelled to cooperate in effecting these curtailments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why, Mr. President, when this body—in a somewhat arbitrary manner, it is true—ordered a reduction of these general appropriation bills 10 per cent below the amount passed by the House, there is not anyone here who does not know that almost every chief of department and every Cabinet officer not only exerted all the powerful influence that he possessed, but he prompted message after message sent to Members of the Senate from citizens living in remote parts of this country with a view to overwhelming them with pressure and preventing the economies which the President was urging; and the President never turned a hand or said a word. Do you not think it is about time that he was standing up, standing in the open, and speaking frankly and definitely?

That is what the resolution seeks. That is what it asks; and I say that before this session has proceeded much further, before another dollar of taxes shall be imposed, we should obtain this information from the Executive.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, accepting as accurate the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], he tells us that no such announcement was made by the President as was quoted in the newspapers.

In other words, the President and the Republican conferees on the economy bill met to discuss economy, and, according to Congressman WOOD, the furlough-without-pay plan was not discussed at the conference. They wanted to discuss ways and means by which money could be saved, and yet never mentioned the fact that in the conference there were two plans—one to save $122,000,000, one to save at most $80,000,000, and the President said not one word in behalf of the plan that would save $122,000,000!

Can he really be seeking methods to economize? If so, the President to-day can send for the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the Representative from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and tell them that because it is urgent that we should effect greater economies he wants them to agree to the plan that he told the Senate and told the Nation he was in favor of, namely, the committee plan. If he will do this, he will save at least $40,000,000.

Instead of that, having publicly urged support of the committee plan, and having privately wrecked it by appealing to the administration's friends to adopt his plan, he now asks that the Congress effect greater economies!

Mr. President, the President ought to know the situation, if he does not. According to the appropriation bills as they stand to-day, if signed by the President at this hour, in their present situation, whether in conference, in the Appropriations Committee, or reported for consideration here, the reduction below the Budget estimates amounts to $168,000,000. In this economy plan there is a difference as to the proposed savings. There is no question about the 10 per cent plan. The pay roll of the Government is $1,300,000,000. When we save 10 per cent of that we have $130,000,000. Deducting from that the Army and Navy, it brings it down to approximately $125,000,000.

When we enter into a consideration of the savings under the present furlough plan, no man can make even a reasonable guess as to the savings, for that bill authorizes the President, through the heads of departments, to exempt employees from provisions of the bill. No United States marshal will be granted a furlough, no district attorney, no collector of internal revenue. The men with big salaries will escape. The little fellows will be made to bear the brunt of the furlough. In each office one man may be selected to suffer a reduction by reason of the furlough and another man may be exempted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to inquire of the Senator if, under the furlough plan, the saving or economy is not supposed to be secured by letting one-twelfth of the employees have a furlough without hiring substitutes.

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that it depends on who is arguing it. If the man is in favor of economy, he says it means we are going to save one-twelfth. If, like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], he is in favor of giving people work, he will say that the purpose of it is to give substitutes work. If we give substitutes work, then there is no saving.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I wanted to develop.

Mr. BYRNES. If we save money, then people are put out of jobs.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If substitutes are put to work, there is no economy at all.

Mr. BYRNES. No economy at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then how could anyone figure $80,000,000 of saving?

Mr. BYRNES. The $80,000,000 estimate was made by a Representative in Congress who urged the plan, and for the purpose of the argument I was taking only his figures, knowing, as I do, that it would never result in the saving of even $60,000,000, the amount of savings is dependent upon the number of exemptions and the number of substitutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator, if economy may be effected by giving furloughs one-twelfth of the time without the appointment of substitutes, to take up the same amount of money, is it not evident that the deparments are employing one-twelfth more employees than they need?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator's question is in itself an answer. But let me say to the Senator something which I thank many gentlemen have overlooked in attempting to calculate the savings to be effected. Take, for instance, the General Accounting Office provided for in the bill which is to be next considered. There is provided for that office an appropriation of $3,700,000, all of which is for personnel. The Committee on Appropriations has made the 10 per cent reduction in that office. We count that as a saving; we figure that we have saved 10 per cent of the total of $3,710,000. The furlough proposition comes along, and it is argued that there is going to be a saving through that. How? If we adopt the furlough plan, and say to the employees in the General Accounting Office, "You can all stay in your jobs, but you have to get out for one month, during which time you will not be paid," it is very evident that, as we deducted only 10 per cent, the amount of money that is appropriated is sufficient to retain every employee in the General Accounting Office. They will receive pay for one month less, they will be paid for 11 months only. The amount of money is sufficient to pay them. It certainly can not be said that 10 per cent will be saved by the reduction of appropriations, and then that 10 per cent will be saved by furloughing the employees. That is a duplication.

For instance, if in the office of the Secretary of the Interior there was an appropriation of $100,000 for personnel, and the Committee on Appropriations and the Congress should cut that 10 per cent, the Secretary of the Interior would get for personnel $90,000 instead of $100,000. That would represent a saving to the taxpayers of $10,000, and necessitate dismissal of employees drawing $10,000.

If the furlough proposition is adopted, and the employees of that office, 50 of them drawing $2,000 a year, are furloughed for 30 days without pay, the Secretary of the Interior can take that $90,000 and he can pay those 50 men for 11 months' work. He has enough money to do it, but there is only a saving of $10,000. We can not save twice in the same reduction. Therefore, to the extent that there is any reduction in personnel under the furlough plan, it is a duplication of the reduction in the appropriation bill. It can not be otherwise.

If the President is really sincere and earnest in his statement that so much money must be saved, then he ought to comply with the request of the Senator from Arkansas and submit a detailed statement of where the economies can be made. If he does so, my only hope is that whatever committee is charged with the duty of considering the matter will not suffer the same experience the Economy Committee had; if the President is induced again publicly to announce that he is in favor of a plan, I trust that he will refrain from privately defeating that plan.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we have an interesting situation in this country, a situation which is calculated to confuse business and raise doubts in the public mind. One day in headlines in every newspaper in the country we see that the President of the United States is reported to have said that we need $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 more to balance the Budget, and that if we do not get it out of the economy program we must get it out of increased taxes on the American people. That is not very good reading. That is not calculated to restore confidence. That does not inspire people with the belief that their Government is again strong and ready to go ahead.

Here in this great forum the distinguished leader on this side of the aisle [Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas] proposes a resolution asking the head of this Government to send to the Senate a bill of particulars, specific recommendations whereby we might get more money, and save $150,000,000 to $200,000,000, a perfectly natural thing to do, a suggestion of orderly procedure, because if there is one man in this country who ought to be better able than anyone else to make specific recommendations for cuts and retrenchment, because of his strategic position, it is the President of the United States. He is the one designated by law to send in the Budget upon which expenditures are to be made. He is the one who, through his Director of the Budget, must make the recommendations. Indeed, the Budget law specifically charges the President of the United States to make specific recommendations at the beginning of each session of Congress, and to suggest even coordination of bureaus and reorganization of agencies in the interest of economy and retrenchment.

The President has his great array of Cabinet around him, with all their assistants, the wise heads of this administration, the geniuses of all time—Mr. Hoover and his big and little kitchen cabinet. [Laughter.] Where should we go to get specific recommendations as to the working out of some economies other than to this great array of talent? Of course, I imagine that most of them are sojourning out in Chicago now, going through the funeral obsequies out there. But they will soon be back, with hearts heavy and spirits dampened, and they can get their wise heads together and exchange views and send to the Senate what is asked for in the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas.

This resolution ought to pass. There should not be a voice lifted against it, and I am indeed surprised that the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] should raise an objection. If what he says is true, that the newspapers have misrepresented the facts, and that the President did not make the statement which has been broadcast through the press, we have gotten to a pretty low state; it is pretty bad that it has come to the point in this administration when even the newspapers will lie as to what the White House spokesman says. As far as I am concerned, I believe that that statement emanated from the White House. I do not know whether the President said it or not, but one of his "400" secretaries up there caused it to go to the newspapers. It is a part of the general propaganda scheme of this administration to try to put the Congress of the United States in bad, to lift the White House in higher favor before the American people. They do not have to go very far to lift it higher before the American people, because it is so low that it would have to go but about an inch to get higher. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEYES in the chair). The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that demonstrations of any kind are against the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. It is bad propaganda in times like these to try to get the newspapers of the country to publish in flaming headlines that the Budget is not balanced, that we must effect $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 more of savings before it will be balanced; and yet the Senator from Pennsylvania now says that the President did not say anything like that. Well, the Senator from Pennsylvania has to get more proof than just that statement, because the correspondents of the great news agencies which carry the news to the American people are gentlemen of standing, and they would not last a second if they were not. They are not going to send out broadcast over this country such articles as that from the White House if they are not true, and you can bet that Saturday night the news went from somebody at the White House, so that the correspondents could carry it, that the Budget was not balanced, that the President, speaking through his spokesman, said that we needed $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 more in the way of cuts in Government expenditures.

Did the President, or anyone speaking for him at the White House, deny it? It has been 36 hours since it was published. If it is not true, why has he kept quiet up to this moment? No, Mr. President; they do not do things that way at the White House. For two days people have been talking about it throughout the country and were calling their friends together to go over the situation, the news that the President of the United States said that the Budget was not balanced.

We have been considering the balancing of the Budget all this year. Eloquent speeches have been made in order to restore confidence, on the theory that we must make expenditures and receipts equal, that the Budget must be balanced. Yet, after we have followed out this program, right here on the eve of an adjournment of Congress, the President of the United States, speaking through his spokesman, in a statement published in all the papers, says that we lack $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 of the amount necessary to balance the Budget.

Ah, if some of these wise heads which have made a futile effort to lead this country during these times of economic trouble and travail would sometimes just keep their mouths closed, the country would get along a little better and the restoration of confidence would be hastened. Some of them talk too much. I think it would have been better, rather than to disturb the peace of the average business man's mind, and shatter confidence again, if some news had leaked out from the White House that the Budget had been balanced. That would have done more good than constantly to get the news that we are short $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 of balancing the Budget.

Listen to me. I want to give some facts, and they will not be denied by a single spokesman on the other side of the aisle, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or the President himself. Sometimes we are diverted and we get off on strange ideas. Let me give you the picture that has been presented in Congress. Let me draw a bill of particulars of just what has happened with reference to the balancing of the Budget. It is simple.

On January 13 of this year Mr. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, came before the Ways and Means Committee and said, "I want $920,000,000 to balance the Budget. I want you to put increased taxes on the American people to that amount. Give me $920,000,000." He did not say a word about retrenchment. When the President sent up his Budget estimates he did not say, "You will have to cut down expenses $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or $250,000,000." He said, "I want the Budget balanced. I will give you a program. I want to raise $920,000,000 in increased taxes, and that will balance the Budget." That is what he said.

Then what happened? That was January 13. On February 9 he came before the Ways and Means Committee, just before they were to report out the bill, and increased his estimate. There is no institution in the world that has changed estimates so quickly, so often, and been wrong so many times as has the Treasury under this administration. They got in the habit of it during the Harding administration. They followed the custom during the Coolidge administration, and it seems now they are worse than during either of the two prior administrations.

On February 9 Mr. Mills came again before the Ways and Means Committee and said, "I was wrong. It is not $920,000,000 that I want. I want $1,241,000,000. I want $321,000,000 more than I told you 26 days ago." But in sending this recommendation he said, "If you will retrench and cut down the estimates that were given to the Congress by my distinguished White House chieftain to the extent of $118,000,000, we can balance the Budget by your raising $1,123,000,000 in taxes." On February 9 he said, "Put the taxes on the people to the amount of $1,123,000,000 and retrench to the amount of $118,000,000 and we will balance the Budget."

The House passed the bill. It carried $1,241,000,000. Of that amount they estimated that $209,000,000 should be in economies and the Secretary of the Treasury pronounced it adequate, said it would balance the Budget, and gave out a statement accordingly. He came over to the Finance Committee of the Senate when the bill got before us and said to us, "Gentlemen, all we need to balance the Budget is $1,241,000,000." That was April 6. That was two months after he had made his last recommendation to the Ways and Means Committee of the House. He said to us on April 6, "While we have that amount of revenue, I believe we can economize to the amount of $200,000,000. I believe the President was wrong to the amount of $200,000,000 when he sent his estimate down to Congress. If you will cut $200,000,000 off that estimate of my chief, we can balance the Budget."

The Finance Committee went to work. We thought they were going to do a pretty good job. We did not like to put this tax and that tax on the people, but we laid aside partisanship. We did not give political results a thought. Democrats and Republicans worked together in order to follow Mr. Mills's suggestion of balancing the Budget by raising $1,241,000,000 in taxes.

On April 14 Mr. Mills came before us again. He had said that all they needed was $1,241,000,000, and added, "If you will just cut $200,000,000 out of the expenditures that will balance the Budget; that will do the job." We went to work. That was April 14. On May 9, after we had finished the work, he did not like some of it. We got into a squabble and I have no criticism to offer for the part he played in it. He came down there and offered a really constructive program, and some of us, being good Democrats and not wanting to take all the blame from our Republican friends, thought it was a pretty good idea to make them share in the responsibility of placing these taxes on the American people; so we accepted his program. What did he say then? That was May 9, just about 30 days ago, three months after he had pronounced the $1,241,000,000 sufficient to balance the Budget when he made his recommendation to the Ways and Means Committee. He said to us on May 9, "If you will report this bill out so it will raise $1,010,000,000 and will work economies to the extent of $231,000,000, the Budget will be balanced."

We reported out the bill, and it carried increased taxes in the amount of $1,010,000,000. We felt then that we would be able to economize below the estimates of the Budget to the extent of $231,000,000; indeed, one bill had passed the House and we had cut from the appropriations a large amount. We saw on May 9 no great obstacle to raising taxes to the amount of $1,010,000,000 and cutting down expenditures by $231,000,000. Mr. Mills said that would balance the Budget.

We went on. That was 30 days ago. Senators know the tragic scene enacted following that. They will remember that after we had worked days and nights to get up the various tax proposals in our tax program and had reported out the bill and had considered it here on the floor of the Senate for days and days and when the manufacturers' sales tax had almost gone glimmering because there were 55 men who had put their signatures to a parchment and said, "We are not going to stand for any manufacturers' sales tax," then it was that certain interests got busy in the country and an influence began to exert itself. When the manufacturers' sales tax crowd saw their dream disappearing and their chances for success fading every moment, then it was that the influences began to be exerted. When we had almost finished our job, when we had put taxes and taxes upon the people and were going to conclude the job the next day, then what happened? We had the program all arranged. Suddenly a voice came from the White House for us to come up there and have a little tête-à-tête with the President. We went. It was an august gathering which met with the President that night. Most of them were Democrats. Of course, the Secretary of the Treasury was there and, of course, Mr. Eugene Meyer was there and other counsellors of the administration were there, and for the first time officially we were notified that our job was not finished, that the Treasury was wrong in its estimate, and that they needed a good deal more money in order to balance the Budget.

We asked Mr. Mills and we asked the President, "How much do you need? What is the estimate? Tell us." The program was not quite completed. It was given to us next morning. The next morning the chairman of the Committee on Finance called the Finance Committee together. We waited for Mr. Mills. He came before us and then for the first time officially he said, "I am wrong in my estimate. I have made a mistake. Notwithstanding that on February 13 I told you that all we needed was $1,241,000,000, notwithstanding that in April I told you the same thing, and that again on May 9 I told you the same thing, I tell you to-day I am away off"; and that was May 31, just a few days ago, just when we were about to finish the job. He said, "I want $285,000,000 more of taxes placed upon the people." I have his testimony here.

We asked, "How are we going to raise it?" Then for the first time he made the suggestion of a manufacturers' sales tax. Then some of us said, "Now, Mr. Secretary, get away from that. You can not put that over. That is an impossibility. Give us an alternative. Make another suggestion as to how to raise $285,000,000." Then it was that the Secretary of the Treasury said, "I would recommend a tax on electricity, I would recommend a tax on gasoline, I would adopt the Connally amendment," which had been defeated before, but which was to be reconsidered by the Senate that morning. He said, "Through these three means you can raise the "$285,000,000." For the first time he said that that morning. Back in January, when he first appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, he did not ask for any cut in balancing the Budget. It was not until February 13 that he asked for a cut in the Budget estimates, and that was for $118,000,000. Before the Finance Committee he had asked in the end for a $231,000,000 saving from the Budget estimates. But that morning he said, "Not only do I want $285,000,000 in additional taxes but that means you must effect a saving from the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget of $350,000,000." That was the scheme. In other words, in less than four months' time he showed a difference in his estimates of what would balance the Budget of approximately $517,000,000. He did not want any saving in the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget at first. Then he asked for $118,000,000 of saving, later on for $231,000,000, and at last $350,000,000. We put on over $285,000,000 of increased taxes. We adopted the suggestion and we thought our job had been finished, but then came the economy program.

There has not been the slightest delay or equivocation upon the part of the Congress of the United States in responding to the suggestions and recommendations of the administration with reference to balancing the Budget. Yes; we have taken our political lives in our hands in order to vote time and again for propositions which we knew were not politically popular, but which we knew were necessary in order to balance the Budget. We had met their demands. Then what happened?

The economy plan came on. A bill was reported that would have saved $250,000,000. Upon the recommendation of the committee itself which had been working on it we struck out the provision relating to war veterans. I was willing to follow them through. I had made up my mind to go down the line with them, because they had given consideration to those questions and knew more about them than I did. But when the distinguished gentlemen who had had the matter in charge, the leaders of that committee, deserted their own plan, there was nothing else to do but to wipe out that provision. That knocked out about $50,000,000. They could still have passed the bill and have effected economies to the amount of approximately $200,000,000; but what happened? In my opinion there happened one of the most reprehensible things politically that has ever happened in an American Congress. I did not care whether they adopted the furlough plan or the 10 per cent reduction plan. I knew that in order to balance the Budget, as we were told we had to do, we would have to effect some economies, and I was willing to vote the 10 per cent reduction if that was the way we could effect the greatest economy. The committee recommended that, and so I was for it. We adopted it, and we were told that it would save $200,000,000; but suddenly there came a flare-back; there came a mysterious influence working upon the Senate. Senators were buttonholed; they were telephoned; they were seen by some apostle of the White House, and one by one they flickered, one by one they gave way, one by one they said, "Well, I voted for the 10 per cent cut; that was fair; I thought if I drew $10,000 a year and gave $1,000 to the Government that other employees receiving $1,500 a year could stand a reduction of $150 a year; but if the President wants the furlough plan, I am willing to surrender, I am willing to go along with him." So the flat 10 per cent cut was taken out of the bill.

How much would be lost by eliminating the 10 per cent cut and adopting the furlough plan? Some one said that $40,000,000 was all. "Well, how are you going to get the other $40,000,000?" "I do not know." "Well, what does the President say about it? You tell me that the White House is trying to bring its influence to bear to cut the economy program of $200,000,000 down so that we will lose $40,000,000, but where does the President say we are going to get the balance"? "I do not know." "Does he not make any suggestion about it?" "I do not know." But a sufficient number of votes of Senators on the other side of the Chamber were obtained to reverse the position, and so President Hoover's furlough scheme was adopted.

If it shall be finally adopted—and I trust it will not be—I hope that Senators who voted for it will have as many men and women coming to their offices as there are soldiers now at the camp near Washington complaining to them about the discrimination that some chief of a bureau is showing against this employee or that employee and telling how favoritism is being shown and how the chief of this bureau or that bureau has let this particular employee out on furlough because he does not like him so well or because he thinks some other employee is a better worker. Discrimination! Favoritism! That is what is going to take place, and Senators are going to have complaints galore if the furlough plan shall be finally adopted. When employees with complaints come to me before the 4th of March next, I am going to say, "Go up and see Herbert Hoover," and if they come after the 4th of next March, I am just going to "Blame it on him," anyway.

It was all wrong for the President of the United States to dip in here when we were doing our best to effect a saving in Government expenditures so that the Budget could be balanced; but he did it, and no one within the sound of my voice now will get up and deny that he did exercise his influence.

Ah, but some Senator may say, "He did not speak to me." No; he did not have to speak to individual Senators, perhaps; all he had to do was to send Walter Newton here and whisper something in their ears and they fell over in order to cooperate with the administration.

I hope that the conference committee will repudiate the furlough plan, will put a 10 per cent reduction in the bill, and give the President his economy bill that will bring about a saving approaching $200,000,000, and then that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and the Senate itself and the House of Representatives will effect sufficient other economies in the general appropriation bills to amount to $160,000,000 or $175,000,000, so that the lips may be sealed of men in high places who, in order to get into the press, are constantly saying that the Budget is not balanced. Let us have a little cooperation here; let us go through with this plan; let us effect the greatest savings that we can and retrench at every place where it is possible.

So this resolution offered by the distinguished leader on this side of the aisle in asking the White House for a bill of particulars, in asking it to recommend specifically where we can effect a greater saving, should be adopted, and Senators on the other side of the aisle know it should be adopted. They know it is not fair to the Congress of the United States for such an impression as that created by the publication in the newspapers on yesterday morning to go out to the country that the President of the United States says that we lack $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 of balancing the Budget.

Ah, Mr. President, the President of the United States occupies a strategic position. No matter what he says the newspapers will carry it; they put him on the front page. Some one has told him that the Congress is "in bad"; that it is not in good standing with the country. I do not know why it is not in good standing with the country. The Congress of the United States to-day is composed of just as courageous and able men as in the past. It took Mr. Hoover's Budget and riddled it to pieces; the Congress has already cut the appropriations $150,000,000 below his recommendations.

The Congress is not entitled to any censure at the hands of the American people. If they knew what had gone on, and if they could appreciate how we have laid aside all partisan considerations trying to work in these days of depression and in a crisis in our country's history for the welfare of the country, they would have quite a different notion about the Congress than some of them seem to have to-day. It comes with poor grace, indeed, for the President of the United States, holding the position he does, to try to put the Congress "in bad" by making the people believe, after these months of trial here, that we have failed to do our job and that we have not balanced the Budget by from one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars. If the Budget is not balanced, the fault is with the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, and not the American Congress.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the Chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to page 501 of the Budget which the President submitted to Congress. On that page it is shown that the President has a special bureau called the Bureau of the Budget, embracing some 35 highly paid experts. These 35 experts received salaries which totaled $191,000 in 1932, and the President reduced that amount to $190,000 for 1933. The President having these facilities, embracing these experts, does the Senator not think that he should be able at any time to tell us exactly where the saving could be made?

Mr. HARRISON. There is not any doubt about it; he is in a strategic position and ought to furnish us a bill of particulars.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment the bill (S. 4736) to authorize the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. to extend its present track connection with the United States Navy Yard so as to provide adequate railroad facilities in connection with the development of Buzzards Point as an industrial area in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11361) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CANNON, Mr. GRANFIELD, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. HOLADAY, and Mr. SIMMONS were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 429) to amend section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand the unfinished business is now before the Senate. To that measure I desire briefly and with some difficulty, on account of a slight cold, to address myself.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think in view of the importance of the pending bill, and the fact that many of the Senators, I am sure, have not had an opportunity to examine with the care that they should like, that we ought to have a full House, and, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator, but I do not care to yield for that purpose. There is as large an attendance here as there would be following a quorum call.

Mr. KING. Of course, I have to submit to the Senator's wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. McNARY. Many Senators are attending important committee meetings; we have lost an hour this afternoon from the time set for the consideration of the bill, and it is my hope that we may have a vote. Viewing it from that standpoint, while again expressing my appreciation of the thoughtfulness of the Senator from Utah, I shall have to decline to yield.

Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for many years have been engaged in considering various phases of the farm problem. During all these years the three major farm organizations have been unable to come to an agreement with respect to how the surpluses of agricultural products should be handled. It will be recalled by the Members of the Senate that some years ago the Senate on two occasions took favorable action with respect to the equalization fee which was sponsored by the American Farm Bureau Federation. In 1929, when the agricultural marketing act was passed by the Senate, it contained a provision incorporating the so-called debenture plan. When the bill went to conference, however, that plan was objected to by the House conferees, and, after some discussion, the Senate conferees receded, and the marketing act was finally passed without the debenture plan.

Mr. President, during all these years the Senate Committee on Agriculture has listened with an attentive ear to the various farm organizations in presenting their grievances and their suggested relief plans for consideration. During the fall of 1931 the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and other members of the committee suggested to the representatives of the farm organizations that they make a further attempt to compose their differences and settle upon some plan with respect to the solution of the surplus problem.

All thoughtful students of the agricultural situation must admit that one of the major and most serious problems involved is that of handling, controlling, and making final disposition of the surplus. Until that problem is solved the farmer will have that factor with which to contend, which will prevent him, in many instances, from receiving the cost of production for the commodities which he raises.

During April of the present year the three farm organizations pooled, I may say, their views and brought to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a proposal practically in the language of that now presented in the pending unfinished business, which is in the nature of an amendment to the agricultural marketing act passed by the Congress in 1929.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will my friend yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator intend to discuss the three features of the bill in order?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; very briefly, however, because they have been before the Senate on other occasions.

Mr. President, the three major organizations about which I speak are the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the Farmers' Union, comprising in their membership about 3,000,000 farmers.

Probably this is the most audible voice that comes from the various farm groups. Hence, when I say that these organizations came to an agreement, I assume that they represent, and indeed I know that they represent, practically all of the organized farmers of the country.

It has long been known by those who are familiar with the marketing act of 1929, of which the Federal Farm Board is the administering agent, that it has failed in its operations to control the surplus because of the want of authority in that act to get the products that have been acquired out of the country. I think it was clearly understood by those who followed the original act that in permitting the Farm Board to acquire and store in this country the surplus, and thereby fix the price level, the one great weakness was the fact that the grain or agricultural products were stored and retained in this country.

Take the instance of wheat: Unquestionably the Farm Board, in the period from October, 1930, to July, 1931, during which it was operating, fixed the price of wheat at about 74 cents a bushel. Immediately after the operations were over the price level sank to the world level. During that time, of course, large expenditures of public money were made and a portion lost. To the credit of the Farm Board be it said, it was their judgment that they should maintain and guarantee the credit structure of the country, particularly in the wheat States. But if the board at that time—provided there were in foreign markets a demand for the wheat—had had one of these vehicles to get the wheat out of the country and charge up the losses against the producers, that great menace that has hung over the wheat price for the last year would have disappeared. Indeed, it would not have been brought into existence.

So, Mr. President, to meet this situation the farmers are attempting by this threefold proposal to handle the surplus problem only. There is no money asked to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States in any sum whatsoever, although in all frankness it must be stated that if the debenture plan should be employed by the board certain sums ordinarily intended for the Treasury would be diverted.

Before these three devices can be employed, the Farm Board must make inquiry and must ascertain four designated sets of facts to be in existence. The board can not arbitrarily set in operation or invoke the machinery that is provided for in these proposals. It must find that there is a surplus in excess of domestic requirements, that there is a surplus in excess of the requirements for orderly marketing. It must find that the board can not, under the present marketing act, handle the situation effectively. It must also find that the cost of production exceeds the sale price of the agricultural commodities produced by the farmers of the country. It must finally find that the product lends itself to the operation of one of these plans.

After careful inquiry by the board, if it finds that these four conditions exist—namely, that there is a surplus in the country over and above domestic requirements, that the farmer can not sell at the cost of production, that the agricultural commodity lends itself to the operation defined by the amendment, and that the marketing act as it now exists in its provisions is unable to take care of the situation—it then can, in its judgment, invoke one of the three plans proposed in this amendment.

The first one is the equalization fee. That has been twice before Congress. It simply provides that the Farm Board may segregate the surplus from that which is required to meet the domestic demands. It must then estimate the cost and the losses that will accrue from disposing of the surplus. After that is done it levies a fee, called an equalization fee, upon the crop, and that is paid by the farmer when he disposes of his commodity. It is a device that has been thought to be simple and practicable; and one of the strong features of the equalization fee is that it is no tax upon the Treasury of the United States. It operates precisely as great manufacturers have operated in the sale of their surpluses abroad in private enterprise. It is fashioned, indeed, out of the operations of the steel companies, the textile companies, and manufacturers generally, who have and must depend upon a foreign market to control their surplus.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator, for information, what is meant by the sentence commencing on line 25, page 3, and including lines 1 and 2 on the next page, where it states—

> Any such agreement shall provide for the payment from the stabilization fund.

Mr. McNARY. That stabilization fund has no relation whatsoever to the stabilization fund in the marketing act. The fund is created by the charge called the equalization fee, which is paid by the producers themselves. That is the stabilization fund. Whenever the board determines what the cost and losses of handling and selling the surplus at the world price will be, that amount goes into the stabilization fund out of which the losses are recouped, so that the Treasury is not attacked in any way.

Mr. KING. Then that is in harmony with the Senator's statement that it does not invade the present $500,000,000 fund possessed by the Farm Board?

Mr. McNARY. Not a penny.

The next plan is the debenture plan. That is proposed in the same form that was in the bill that passed the Senate, known as the farm marketing act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says the debenture plan is in the same form in which it was before us when we passed the farm marketing act.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The form in which it was proposed then was just a little different from the form in which it was later proposed as an amendment to the tariff act.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Which form is used here?

Mr. McNARY. I am glad the Senator has spoken of that if it is any improvement at all. I was told by the drafting bureau and the legislative representatives of the different farm organizations that they took the final draft. I presume that was the one in which it was offered as an amendment to the tax bill. I do not recall that there was any substantial difference between the two drafts.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that there is this difference: The first time it was proposed I think, as a matter of fact, it was just as effective as the second time; but after it was proposed there was a criticism leveled at it by President Hoover in which he said, among other things, that if it were passed the result would be that the importers would form a combination and refuse to buy these debentures, and that by their combination they could keep down the value of them. The next time it was offered, that objection was met by a proviso that the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any funds coming into his hands from duties on imports, could offer to buy those debentures at 98 per cent of their face value.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Senator must be corrected in this: The criticism of the President was leveled at the proposal before it was considered by the Senate, in a letter written to the chairman of the committee, and also in a letter received from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. In order to correct the criticism about which the able Senator has just spoken, we inserted in that proposal, and it is in this bill, a provision that the Treasury itself could redeem these debentures up to 98 per cent of their face value. That is in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the debenture proposal simply provides that when agricultural products are exported—of course, that again refers to the surplus—the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue debentures which are receivable by collectors of customs or by the Treasury Department. To this extent I must frankly state, as I did on another occasion, that that money does come from the Treasury of the United States; it is impounded and used for the benefit of agriculture before it reaches the Treasury; and to that extent this amendment does carry an appropriation. It is workable. I think no one will doubt that it is. The criticism I had for it when I spoke on a former occasion was simply that I thought it was in the nature of a subsidy, and probably agriculture would not be satisfied with relief of that kind.

It is not for me to pass judgment upon that. It is up to the board to determine, if this proposal should become a law, what agency or machine here provided they would like to utilize in the event there is a surplus above domestic requirements.

The last plan has never been before the Congress. It is the so-called allotment plan. It is proposed by the Farmers' Union, a third large organized group of farmers. It has some of the underlying and fundamental principles involved in the other two plans. It provides that the Farm Board shall again segregate the surplus from that which is required for domestic use, and then it shall attempt to ascertain the cost of production, and fix that as the price at which the commodity shall be sold to the American consumer through a process of licensing the dealers in these various agricultural products.

For more than two years the Farmers' Union has favored the allotment plan. The matter was presented through that great organization to the committee. Some of the committee members thought it was workable and feasible. Others objected to it, but a majority inserted it in the amendment.

It must be said that it does involve the licensing powers of the Government. It is, frankly, in the nature of a price-fixing device. It is for the board to determine whether it is more practicable or less practicable than the other measures.

That, in a few words, explains these three proposals. First, I want the Senators to keep in mind that there must be four findings made. These findings are prerequisite to any operation under the machinery specified in this measure.

If the board finds that these four conditions obtain, then they may use any one or all of these plans. They may employ the equalization plan, which provides that the farmer himself shall pay for all losses. They may decide to employ the debenture plan, under which the ultimate losses, if any, will rest upon the Government. They may desire to employ the great power of the Government to license and to fix prices, which is the allotment plan.

It has been, and is now, the judgment of a majority of the committee that the marketing act should be strengthened by providing some method of handling the surplus, and these are the only methods which have been brought to the attention of the committee which it was thought would be efficacious and practicable.

So long as we do produce a surplus, and the marketing act does not provide a means for handling it, just that long the surplus problem will be here to hamper and injure the farmers of the country.

With this brief statement, in which I hope I have given an outline of the purpose and intention of the amendment, I yield the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, there is hardly more to be said in support of the pending bill than has been offered by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], both in his address to the Senate at this hour and in the report which he has made, which accompanies the bill.

We have under consideration a bill which would make available any one or all of three plans to accomplish prices for farm products which will be equivalent to production costs and afford a profit to the farmer. I earnestly hope for its passage. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes in urging the favor of the Senate to this bill.

There are lines which have been quoted many, many times in the Congress of the United States and elsewhere, but in part I want to quote them again. They are lines written by Edwin Markham, in The Man with the Hoe, following his observing a painting of a French farmer, which painting so impressed Markham as to cause him to write those lines which are going to live forever. He wrote:

O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
Is this the handiwork you give to God,
This monstrous thing distorted and soul-quenched?
How will you ever straighten up this shape;
Touch it again with immortality;
Give back the upward looking and the light;
Rebuild in it the music and the dream;
Make right the immemorial infamies,
Perfidious wrongs, immediate woes?

O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
How will the future reckon with this man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
When this dumb terror shall reply to God,
After the silence of centuries?

I have not offered these oft-quoted lines as a threat, or even as a warning. They are not a prophecy on my part. I have offered them only because of the question they ask. We can well afford to ponder them.

What we have on our hands now, the most critical economic situation the Nation has known, was inevitable. I do not like to place myself in the light of one of these "I-told-you-so" people, but I am going to refer back to remarks of mine on this floor on May 24, 1926, over six years ago. I then said, in discussing the farm needs, that we should not be misled by the then pending prosperity talk. I said that that prosperity was not being shared by the farmer, and that—such prosperity may continue for a time; it can continue only so long as there is blood left to squeeze out of the farmer; but the supply is not inexhaustible. Indeed, the flow grows less and less daily. Sooner or later this prosperity bubble will burst—it is bound to burst.

And it did burst. It had to, when those who were creating the wealth were bled white, after their equities and their surpluses were gone. That half of the population of America directly dependent upon the farms could not continue holding up the false prosperity indefinitely. And because agriculture's needs were destroyed, so now we find business generally destroyed, and millions of unemployed as a result of it.

There are those who sincerely believe that the needs of the farm people have been overpainted. It can not be overdone. There exists to-day on every farm a most depressing situation which has been growing since the deflation program inaugurated by terrible judgment in 1920. To anyone who knows these farm people their plea for help is recognized as being based upon the best sort of a foundation, and with just cause. Sometimes I think that the best thing Congress and the President could do would be to recess and cause every Member to get out and see with his own eyes just what were the conditions on the farm. After such a visitation I have no doubt but that there would be a very positive return in the way of legislation that would accomplish the affording of prices for agricultural products such as would make the farm people once again the power they have been in affording markets for the products and services of the mills, factories, banks, professional people, and railroads of America.

The farm bill now before us is the first piece of legislation upon which the heads of all the national farm organizations have agreed. It marks, to my way of thinking, the turning point in the legislative battle for the American farmer. With the farm leaders finally agreed upon a program, it is fair to expect a better recognition of agriculture and its needs at the hands of those forces which have it in their power to restore agriculture, and restore opportunity for those who toil on the farms to win a reasonable reward from their labors, to pay their debts, and go into the market places and buy the things they want and need.

So critical is the farm situation, Mr. President, that I feel the pending bill may not be adequate to fully cope with the present-day needs; but I give it my fullest measure of support, because I believe it is the utmost that can be expected of Congress before it adjourns, and because I am confident that it will go far in helping accomplish recovery for such of our farm people as are not carrying too great a burden of debt. But for many of our farm people something more is needed.

That "something more" is available in the form of the legislation offered by my colleague, and known as the Frazier bill, which has been favored by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and which is now upon the Senate Calendar. That bill goes to the very base of agricultural difficulty, and would save at once the homes of thousands of farm people and give them a new lease upon life. The Frazier bill would afford a program of refinancing of farm indebtedness, place the farmer firmly upon his feet, and afford happiness and contentment in those places where discouragement and hopelessness now prevail. More than that, it would straightway afford a debt-paying program and a buying program that would bring recovery to sick America at once.

But the Frazier bill constitutes a drastic change in the business of money lending! Those who to-day control the money of the country and swing the power that goes with that control are not going to permit passage of the Frazier bill without the severest kind of a battle. The Frazier bill would quite completely destroy their power. The bill is too drastic a change, some of our colleagues here in this body declare. But sooner or later my colleagues are going to awaken to the fact that the situation existing throughout the land is one which calls for drastic change, and the longer we put off the task of affording relief the more drastic will need be the means resorted to to accomplish the desired ends.

The greatest trouble with us, with Congress, with the Government, is that we fear new thoughts; we dread to depart from the beaten path; we withhold our support of things which are new and a departure from old ways. It is my hope that the next six months will have the effect of impressing upon Congress and the President the importance of accepting drastic means and new ways of righting wrongs of long standing, whereupon we can expect serious and successful consideration of the Frazier bill, even though it does step heavily upon the toes of our international banker Shylocks who seem to be a world unto themselves, but nevertheless dictating what shall be done in every other world and country, including our own.

Mr. President, we are too afraid of new ways, new methods. But until we do accept these we are destined to stay just as thoroughly mired as we are to-day. That there is prospect for passage of the pending McNary 3-way farm bill is evidence that we are fast swinging into a frame of mind which shies less from new ways and new methods. There are new departures involved in the pending bill. Some of them have been previously passed upon favorably by Congress, though they have met with presidential veto thereafter.

That the mind is changing is well evidenced by the things the Congress and the President has done this past year. The law creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation adopts programs which heretofore have been considered quite unreasonable and impossible. The fault with this program, however, is that it carries aid and comfort almost alone to the very interests which have drained the country, the very influences which have contributed so largely to the crash which came to America. By this program we carry water and food to the very oppressors of the common people through these many years. If now we will carry help to the oppressed and give them opportunity to make their efforts count, we will certainly not do more than balance the scales for this session. The McNary bill will assuredly give very necessary help to the farm people.

There are, of course, those who insist that the McNary bill, if it passes Congress, will be vetoed by the President. If the President had another program than the one which is before us, there would be good reason to believe this. But he has no such program. It is therefore fair to assume that he will now accept the principles of this bill, since he must surely know of the desperate need calling for additional farm legislation.

There is no legislation which will go further in restoring the confidence of the country than this bill, which guarantees a buying power for over half our population, which buying power would at once be reflected to the other half of the population.

We have talked all winter and spring about the need of restoring confidence. That was what we were going to do when we passed the moratorium. We know now we failed. Then we were going to accomplish this restoration by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We failed again. Our new banking legislation was going to accomplish what the other new legislation had failed to bring. But it has not turned the trick, either.

The facts are that there is going to be no restored confidence until the masses of people have the means with which to buy the things others are wanting to sell. There is no better way to get this than to get a buying power to the American farmer. Give him dollars for his honest toil. Those dollars, if given him for his products, will pay production costs, will pay bills, and will buy goods. His ability to buy will at once be reflected by every merchant, every doctor, every business man in the towns and cities of agricultural States. Their buying power in turn will be reflected into the automobile factories and the mills and factories producing those things the farmer and business man wants and will buy when he can. Thus can be restored the demand for workers in the mills and factories, and on the railroads. Thus are our most serious unemployment problems solved. Thus is prosperity returned. But I insist, Mr. President, none of this is coming to pass until the farmer is given a price for his products which will enable him to buy.

What is asked for the farmer here and now is nothing more than fair play. He is not a whiner or a beggar. He is not a spoiled child who needs to be or can be babied. I think I know the people who would be helped by this legislation. I have lived with them all my life. They are not cowards. They are not afraid of work. They are not afraid of life and its obligations. They are not seekers after charity. All these people seek is a fair chance to make their investment and their labor return to them a reasonable reward with which to supply the needs of themselves and their children. Give them that chance, Mr. President, and they will demonstrate such a courage and such a will as have made our agricultural people the mainstay of our country and our Government all these years. Deny to them that fair chance, and America must continue to struggle in the grip of the most serious economic wreck our country has ever known.

The pending bill, I believe, gives the farm people the chance they need and must have if any material gain is to be enjoyed as a result of this session of Congress. The bill makes available resort to the debenture plan, the equalization-fee plan, and the allotment plan, any one of them or all of them, in order that production costs may be won to the farmer for his products. Its enactment into law will do precisely what all people want accomplished, namely, win the return of decent conditions to a country which has never known such conditions as now face us in a time of plenty. This bill goes to the base of our economic difficulty in America, and ought to be quickly passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, line 15, after the words "Title I," to insert "The equalization-fee plan."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, times have changed. The numerous speeches that were made here years ago against putting the Government in business are heard no more. The Government has been put into business for the benefit of financial groups, for the purpose of saving the banks, for the purpose of keeping the railroads operating, for the purpose of everything almost except real benefit to agriculture. I am well aware of the fact that a great many hold that the Farm Board put the Government into business for the benefit of agriculture, but I voted against that measure, believing that it would not accomplish what many expected. Had the expectations of those who sponsored it been realized, we would not have been considering this measure to-day.

On the 15th of May the average price of all farm products was 44 per cent below the pre-war level compared with 14 per cent below that level on May 15 of last year. In some of the great agricultural States wheat brought only 35 cents a bushel at the farmer's home market; oats, 16 cents; corn, 22 cents; cotton, about 5 cents a pound; hogs, below $2.50 per hundred; eggs, 6 to 7 cents; and wool, 7 cents. Meanwhile the price of things farmers buy have fallen a little, but are still above the pre-war level.

However, there is coming to be a realization on the part of business generally. Just this morning two witnesses before the Committee on Banking and Currency, witnesses who come from big business institutions, the largest in the land, admitted that a return of national prosperity would depend on the return of agricultural prosperity. They admitted it could not come without agricultural prosperity. That is a different viewpoint than there used to be, but perhaps it is a reflection of the cold realization that the debts of the country can not be paid with present price levels. Perhaps it is a realization of the fact that this problem is no longer a problem of the farmer alone, but is a problem which involves the creditor of the farmer. The farm mortgage can not be paid with present prices, and the creditor class can take its choice between bankruptcy and getting the property, or according agriculture fair prices, or cheapening the money of the country.

It is strange that an economic catastrophe had to hit business in order to give many of our business leaders a realization of the plight of agriculture. In the past 10 or 12 years we have considered numerous measures. We twice passed the McNary-Haugen bill embodying the equalization fee. It was fought by chambers of commerce, big business of the East. Many were inclined to realize the seriousness of the farmer's troubles. Others declared that bill and other measures economically unsound. Still others scoffed at the idea that the farming depression, unless effectively remedied, would bring ruin to the business community as well. The more far-seeing among them realized that something had to be done for agriculture, but were totally at a loss when it came to recommending something.

The farmer, on the other hand, has shown a much greater readiness to understand the other man's problem than the other man showed in understanding the farmer's. To-day we hear in the farming communities much sympathy expressed for those who are walking the streets looking for a job, for those who stand in the bread line. The farmers see the great paradox of overabundance of wheat and people starving for lack of bread; an overabundance of cotton and people in rags for want of even the simplest clothing. Were it not for the farmer's keen understanding of the troubles confronting the man in the city to-day, there would be an even more pronounced protest from farmers than we have heard in recent months. Their bitterness would be greater. Their righteous indignation over the economic injustice they have suffered through these years of price inequality has been softened by the depression in the cities. Now the time is opportune for the people of the country and of the city, in a mutual understanding of their adversities, to work together for practical measures of improvement.

One version of the allotment plan would levy an excise tax on millers, and, of course, would be passed on to the consumer. This would raise a fund out of which to pay the bounty. The effect would be to make the tariff apply to that part of that crop that is marketed at home and not to the part sold abroad.

Another advantage of this would be that it should not invite foreign retaliation. The price of wheat would not be changed by the plan; therefore there would be no dumping and real excuse for applying antidumping duties in foreign countries. Let me repeat: The farmer would get his regular price plus a bounty on that part that is used in this country.

The application of the principles of the bill is optional with the Farm Board. That is an unfortunate feature of it. I wish it were mandatory. I wish it had been possible to describe definitely when and how each of these plans should be applied. This bill is called the 3-way plan. It provides that the Farm Board must use one of three plans to bring about a better price—an American price which would be at least equal to the cost of production, including wages for the farmer. The board may invoke:

(a) The export-debenture plan.

(b) The equalization-fee plan.

(c) An allotment plan—one of several plans being worked out, and possibly not the best one, but it is the one agreed upon.

But I think we have reached the point where no administration will hold out and say, "We are not going to do anything, because we can not." I believe this bill, when it becomes a law, will furnish them ample authority under which to do something by which to bring the farm products to a level more equal to the products of the factory.

Of the three plans I think nothing is stronger than the allotment plan, but I do not want to be in the position of indorsing every feature of the allotment plan at the present time. There are some features of it I do not like. There are some features that may not work out well in practice, but we have learned from legislative experience that we have to change our laws as experience gives us more light.

That feature of the allotment plan which would increase the returns for that part of the crop that is needed in domestic market is the strongest feature in the idea. Let me give briefly the reasons why the allotment plan—not necessarily as it is written in this bill but the general idea of it—would meet objections that have been raised to the equalization fee and the debenture:

We have been told that the debenture and the equalization fee would stimulate production and increase the surplus. I am not, and have not been, in sympathy with all the arguments advanced on this point. The allotment plan, however, does provide a more effective check on production than is provided in the other proposals. Essentially, and leaving out all technicalities, it proposes to make the higher price effective on that part of the crop that is sold in the domestic market; the remainder the farmer may sell on a world-price basis. If a farmer has been producing an average of 800 bushels in the past few years and gets an allotment of 500 bushels for the domestic market, and if he should need 100 bushels for seed and other purposes on the farm, he would have 200 bushels for export. One allotment proposal, which appeals to me greatly, would pay a premium of an amount approximately equal to the tariff on the 500 bushels for the domestic market. The farmer would sell his wheat as he sells it now; 200 bushels could go into export trade. If he should the next year produce a larger amount—let us say a thousand bushels—he would get the bounty on only the 500 bushels. Therefore the bounty would afford no incentive to increased production.

This bill is a product of the work all winter of three of the leading farm organizations working together trying to work out something that they felt would be acceptable to Congress, compromising here and compromising there; but nevertheless it represents the instrumentality by which agriculture can be lifted out of the dumps if the administrative authorities will do it when they get the law.

I predict we will have to make changes in the law, but we make changes in every important law that has been enacted by Congress, so this will be no exception. It will be the turning point. Here we have a country so full of resources, so full of capable people, so full of plenty, and yet filled with distress and starvation; banks full of money and nobody has money; warehouses full of goods and nobody has the goods; land that will produce everything, and on every hand the people are in want. After all, is it a matter of coordination and a matter of a little more confidence in the situation? Confidence must come out of possible earnings, must come out of employment.

By coordination I mean that stability of economic relationships which will make it possible for one economic group to exchange with another, so that the people of the industries will not lack for bread when they are in the position to produce things which the farmer—having too much wheat—very much needs for himself and family.

By confidence I mean a reasonable assurance that products will bring a fair price and that ability and willingness to labor honestly will bring a living wage. To accomplish these things requires courageous measures, some experimentation in public policy. Some experiments may be thought to involve some danger, but one of the most dangerous experiments we can indulge in now is to let things drift without doing anything. We have got to put people to work and we must recognize that some new problems have come to us. We must recognize that the European markets have been closed to our goods to a great extent and therefore we can not hope for the same amount of exports that we have had, except as they take the low prices for them. The bill proposes not to give the farmer the American price for all his products, but only for that part of his products which are consumed in the United States, which approaches 90 per cent. It would not be so bad a thing for them to sell the other 10 per cent at reduced prices; it would not seriously affect the situation.

It will be possible to restore the earning power for the farmer. He will begin to buy from the factory, and the wheels will be started into motion. Do not expect anything to come suddenly. We have been a long time going down and we may be a long time coming back. But if we once hit the bottom we will start coming back, because the country has great possibilities for coming back. I venture to say this is the first step, but unless agriculture can be put on a purchasing par with other industries, wholesale liquidation will take place and the wheels of the factories will continue to be idle and we will continue to talk about remedies without getting any result.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask that the following resolutions be printed in the RECORD. They were passed at a Republican mass meeting held at Windom, Minn., on June 4, attended by 900 voters. They are typical, I think, of the thought of the rural district of my State, and the demands are well founded in justice to agriculture.

There is no sound reasoning, Mr. President, that agriculture should not, as both the Republican and the Democratic platforms of 1928 demanded, be placed on a parity with other businesses of this country by giving agriculture the benefit of the tariff. There is no reason why agriculture should be crowded off the face of the earth by the Federal reserve system refusing to recognize agricultural security. If we can grant a moratorium to Europe, certainly we can grant one to agriculture. If we can give Europe the principal of our debts outright and accept in lieu thereof a tiny interest of 1.1 per cent over a period of 62 years, as we did with Italy, why can not we do likewise for agriculture, the very foundation of our national life? When agriculture is not prosperous the Nation is not prosperous.

There is no doubt that these 900 voters who have sent me these resolutions desire that I vote for the pending bill, which gives the Farm Board the power of the equalization fee, debenture, and farm-allotment plans, which plans have been unanimously recommended by all farm organizations, which I intend to do.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That we are in immediate need of more currency in circulation, and that we favor the issuance by act of Congress of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to ex-service men in payment of the balance due them in adjusted compensations.

Resolved, That we favor progressive legislation by the Congress of the United States that shall stabilize the dollar and maintain its purchasing power at a fixed level.

Resolved, That interest rates on farm mortgages are too high in proportion to the earning capacity and incomes from labor and investments in agriculture, and that we favor the Frazier bill, No. 1197, so that farms and farm homes may be taken out of the hands of the financial interests and saved to the actual use and occupation by those actually engaged in agriculture.

Resolved, That all bonds of every kind be subject to taxation the same as other property, and that class privilege be eliminated from taxation, and that we are opposed to the issuance of any more tax-exempt securities by the Government or by any department of the Government.

Resolved, That we petition Congress and urge our Senators and Representatives to support and endeavor to pass laws or amendments to existing laws for the relief of agriculture, which include the equalization-fee principle, the debenture plan, and any other proposal that will give the Farm Board direction and power to control agricultural products, values, and the distribution thereof.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement about the bill. The bill contains a provision with reference to what is known as the equalization fee. My view has always been that that proposal is contrary to well-established principles of constitutional law and is unwise as an economic principle. I have always felt, furthermore, that it would prove unfair and unjust to the farmer. I have not changed my view in regard to that matter. I do not propose to argue it at length because it is incorporated in the bill with matters which I do favor, but I do not want to cast a vote which might be construed as an evidence of having modified my views in regard to the equalization fee.

I think the equalization-fee scheme legalizes the inequality between the farmer and the manufacturer of this country. I want to remove that inequality rather than by law make it permanent. It undertakes to embody in our laws a system for the farmer which does not obtain with reference to industry. The manufacturer gets his protection from the Government through the laws of the Government without any charge to him whatsoever. We are proposing to give the farmer a form of protection of some kind, but he must pay for his. I am perfectly clear in my own mind that in time the farmers will reject the proposition. The struggle has been to place the farmer upon an equality with industry and with the manufacturers of the country. Without we succeed in placing him upon an equality with the manufacturer, anything that we may do will in the end be ineffective for his protection. This, in my opinion, runs counter to our professed desire, to give the farmer equality. I feel that we are placing in the law, writing into our system, a conceded difference between the protection which we give to the farmer and that which we give to the manufacturer, or to other industry.

As I said, I do not propose to argue it at length. I regret that it is in the bill, and if I have an opportunity to vote against it singly, I shall not vote for it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the Senator a question. Has the Senator read the allotment plan carried in the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have read it. But I had understood the allotment plan was to be dropped from the bill.

Mr. WATSON. What does the Senator think about this part of it—

(1) To the end that the policy declared in this act may be effectuated, the Federal Farm Board is authorized, whenever it finds that the importation into the United States of any such agricultural products or their substitutes produced outside of the United States materially affects, or is likely to materially affect, the sale in the domestic market of any such agricultural products at a price not less than the cost of production, to proclaim that fact; and thereafter it shall be unlawful to import, directly or indirectly, any such products or their substitutes into the United States.

What does the Senator think about a proposition of that kind which confers upon the Federal Farm Board, without any reference to Congress, without any reference to the Tariff Commission, without any reference to the President, the power to erect an embargo on its own ipse dixit against the importation of grain at any time when they may think it is offered here at less than the cost of production of the same grain in the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is constitutional, and I do not think it in the interest of the farmer.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so either.

Mr. BORAH. But I think it is just as constitutional as the Tariff Commission which we have created. It is no more a delegation of power than the Tariff Commission has.

Mr. WATSON. Does one bad act justify another?

Mr. BORAH. Of course it does not. I am voting for the bill because of the debenture provision which is in the bill. I will vote if I have a chance to strike out all other parts of the bill. I am so certain in my own mind that that will come to be quickly the policy which will be adopted and carried out under the bill that I am willing to vote for the bill, that being in it if I can not see it stricken out. I do not think they have the power to do what is provided for in the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I have no authority to catechize the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. WATSON. But inasmuch as I have great admiration for the Senator's legal ability I would like to ask a further question. In the second section on page 19 it is provided:

It shall be unlawful for any licensee to purchase any agricultural products at a price less than the cost of production proclaimed by the Federal Farm Board.

In other words, a man has to be licensed in order to make the purchase; and it is absolutely unlawful for him to buy any grain at a price less than the price fixed by the Federal Farm Board at its own ipsa dixit. Is that constitutional?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so. And I go further and say it is unwise legislation regardless of the constitutional question.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so, either; I can not think that it is constitutional.

Mr. BORAH. I hope when my vote shall be considered on this measure it will be considered that I was voting for the debenture and nothing else. We are in this situation, Mr. President: This is the only legislation that we are going to have at this session which even looks toward in any way helping agriculture. I have always been an advocate of the debenture system, and I am not going to vote against the bill, although I do not believe in the equalization-fee system, nor do I believe in the other proposition which has been submitted. I wish to repeat, however, that the principle upon which is based the clause which the Senator read is, in my opinion, exactly the principle upon which the Tariff Commission legislation was based.

Mr. WATSON. There is this difference: We do not at any place in the law confer upon the Tariff Commission the power to erect a barrier in the shape of an embargo.

Mr. BORAH. No; but that is only an extension of the principle in accordance with which the power has been given to the Tariff Commission.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator see a distinction between the two? We ask the Tariff Commission to find the difference between the cost of production in this country and in other countries. They find that cost of production as a fact-finding body, and that ends their function. However, we give the Federal Farm Board that same authority, and then also confer upon it the additional power to erect an embargo against the importation of certain commodities.

Mr. BORAH. I think the same power could be conferred upon the Tariff Commission if we followed the principle of the present law. We have now conferred upon the Tariff Commission the power to ascertain the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and the Tariff Commission and the President, neither one of whom has the legislative power in any respect whatever, may say what tax may be levied?

Mr. WATSON. They may establish the tariff rate.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in that way is taken completely out of the hands of the Congress, the body to which it was carefully delegated, the power reposed in it by the fathers; it has been taken out of the hands of Congress and placed in the hands of the Tariff Commission; and when the Tariff Commission makes its report it does not report to the Congress but reports to the Executive, who has no legislative power whatever; that is, he has no legislative power under the Constitution, but an unwise Congress has undertaken to confer legislative power touching the most vital question of government—the power to levy taxes and raise revenue.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHEELER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Is it the view of the Senator from Indiana that this is a prohibition against the purchase of grain only?

Mr. WATSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GLASS. It is a prohibition against the purchase of any agricultural commodity whatever.

Mr. WATSON. I just glanced at it very hurriedly, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. It seems to me that under such a law a licensee, or any grocery business, can not buy a coop of chickens or a dozen eggs without permission from the Farm Board or at any other price than that fixed by the Farm Board.

Mr. WATSON. I think the Senator's interpretation is the correct one. I have just read the provision for the first time.

Mr. GLASS. I am not finding fault with the argument of the Senator from Idaho about the Tariff Commission. I think the Tariff Commission is a delegation of authority, and it is unconstitutional, I venture to say, regardless of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I voted for the debenture originally upon the hypothesis that, although it was utterly unsound, it was the only thing in the nature of a drawback to the farmer that he has ever been offered in compensation for the tribute that he has to pay to the high protected manufacturers; but I would never on earth vote for a bill like this. It is just simply putting the individual citizen of this country in a strait-jacket.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated better than I could my reason for voting for the debenture. I look upon it as some protection to the farmer under a protective tariff system. The debenture could not be justified except as a part of the protective system, for those who must sell in the open market can buy in the closed market.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. I will say, in reply to the Senator from Virginia, that I hope he has not overlooked the fact that there are three different plans provided in the bill and that they are optional. If the Farm Board thinks this one is not practicable or if it is declared unconstitutional, it is then out of the picture, and another one of the plans will be used.

I will admit that there is a difference of opinion as to details, but I am one who firmly believes in the allotment plan. I know that in working it out there will be a great many difficulties encountered, but does not the Senator from Virginia think that some one of the three plans will work?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senate has gone so insane that I am not willing to believe that the Farm Board will not go insane, too, if it has not already gone insane. I do not think we have done a sound thing since we assembled here on the first Monday of last December except to pass some of the appropriation bills; and I think the sooner we pass the other appropriation bills and go home the better it will be for us and for the country, too.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to say before I sit down, so far as the allotment proposition is concerned, I have not given very much consideration to it. As I have said, I have been for the debenture provision, and I am going to vote for it, and if I have an opportunity to vote to strike out the other two propositions, I shall do so.

Mr. WATSON. Why does not the Senator from Idaho make the offer?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before the Senator yields the floor will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question in connection with this matter. The Senator will observe on page 18, under the allotment plan, this provision:

> Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced.

That is, the domestic production for domestic use shall enter commerce. Then it provides:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Does the Senator consider that Congress has the power to prohibit milk or eggs or wheat or pork or any other farm commodity produced within a State to be sold within the State?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am quite sure Congress has no such power.

Mr. BLAINE. Congress has no power to regulate commerce wholly within a State.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not; that is an old-established principle to which the Supreme Court still adheres.

Mr. BLAINE. Has Congress power in regulating commerce among the States, to prohibit from the avenues of commerce those articles which have no inherent evil within themselves, except to a limited extent respecting licensing and taxation?

Mr. BORAH. My view is that Congress has no power to exclude from the channels of interstate trade goods which in themselves are in no sense deleterious or objectionable for some reason such as that they are injurious or something of that kind; that is, such commodities as a person is entitled to purchase and to ship across State lines, such as corn or wheat or eggs or foodstuffs in general. I do not think Congress has any power to exclude them from interstate commerce.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will yield further, it is entirely clear that Congress has no police power, no power under the interstate-commerce clause to prohibit the sale within a State of such products as are raised and produced within the State.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Clearly, the Congress has no such power.

Mr. BORAH. Clearly, that is so; and I think about three-fourths of the bill are unconstitutional.

AMENDMENT OF REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House Joint Resolution 429.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 429) to amend section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by striking out the words "or with any person other than a dealer," and by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "If any article has, under a contract of the character above described, been delivered, prior to June 21, 1932, to any person (other than a dealer or other than a person intending to use the article as material in the manufacture or production of another article, or to sell it on or in connection with, or with the sale of, another article), no tax shall be collected under this title."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11361) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NYE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. NYE, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. KENDRICK conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENT HOOVER'S ADMINISTRATION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, when the Republican National Convention nominated Mr. Hoover for President in 1928, it proclaimed him the one man capable of dealing constructively and successfully with the problems of Government. Few men in the history of this country have received as much free and favorable advertising. In fact this advertising propaganda had been so successful that Mr. Hoover was popularly regarded as a man of magic. No one who accepted the popular estimate of Mr. Hoover's capacity could entertain the slightest doubt of his ability to steer the ship of state unerringly through any storm.

Mr. Hoover has now been President for more than three years. He has had an opportunity to demonstrate his knowledge of statecraft and to justify the high estimate of his friends.

In his speech accepting the Republican nomination on August 11, 1928, Mr. Hoover said:

> Every man has a right to ask of us whether the United States is a better place for him, his wife, and his children to live in, because the Republican Party has conducted the Government for nearly eight years. Every woman has a right to ask whether her life, her home, her man's job, her hopes, her happiness will be better assured by the continuance of the Republican Party in power.

If this was the right of every man in 1928, surely it is the right and privilege of any citizen to ask the same question in 1932. If the question is to be answered, reference must be had to the record of President Hoover's administration.

In the same speech Mr. Hoover made the following statement:

> The Republican Party came into authority nearly eight years ago. It is necessary to remind ourselves of the critical conditions of that time. We were confronted with an incompleted peace and involved in violent and dangerous disputes both at home and abroad. The Federal Government was spending at the rate of five and one-half billions per year; our national debt stood at the staggering total of $24,000,000,000. The foreign debts were unsettled. The country was in a panic from overexpansion due to the war and the continued inflation of credit and currency after the armistice, followed by a precipitant nation-wide deflation which in half a year crashed the prices of commodities by nearly one-half. Agriculture was prostrated; land was unsalable; commerce and industry were stagnated; our foreign trade ebbed away; 5,000,000 of unemployed walked the streets. Discontent and agitation against our democracy were rampant. Fear for the future haunted every heart.

Anyone familiar with conditions in 1921 which followed the unwarranted deflation forced upon the country by the Republican Party must admit that the above quotation is somewhat exaggerated. The credit which he claims for the Republican Party in relieving the country from the condition described is unsupported by the record. He omits to state that when the Republican Party came into power in 1921 we had a cash balance in the Treasury of some $6,000,000,000. It was this cash balance which enabled the Treasury to make the showing which it did in the reduction of the public debt. I am calling attention to this statement, however, for another purpose.

The conditions which Mr. Hoover referred to as existing in 1921, but which did not in fact exist to the extent stated, actually exist to-day in aggravated form. Instead of a cash balance in the Treasury we have a staggering deficit. If fear for the future haunted every heart in 1921, what may be said of the outlook in 1932, after more than three years of Mr. Hoover's administration?

But I quote again from this acceptance speech:

> We in America to-day are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but, given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years, we shall soon with the help of God be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation. There is no guarantee against poverty equal to a job for every man. That is the primary purpose of the economic policies we advocate.

Following this statement Mr. Hoover admitted that the rehabilitation of agriculture had not been completed during the eight years of the Harding and Coolidge administrations, because he said:

> The most urgent economic problem in our Nation to-day is in agriculture. It must be solved if we are to bring prosperity and contentment to one-third of our people directly and to all of our people indirectly. We have pledged ourselves to find the solution.

He did not leave us in doubt as to what the solution for the agricultural problem was to be. He said:

> To search out the common ground on which we may mobilize the sound forces of agricultural reconstruction.

He further stated that:

> An adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief.

The American people apparently accepted not only Mr. Hoover's statement of the achievements of the Republican administrations under the leadership of Harding and Coolidge but also accepted the promises and prophecies as to the future if the Republican Party was again given power to go forward.

Few men who have occupied the high office of President have had more loyal support and cooperation of both major political parties than has Herbert Hoover. I make this statement in spite of the fact that his partisans have repeatedly charged the Democratic National Committee with personal attacks upon the President and with an organized propaganda to "smear Hoover."

The Congress which convened in 1929 in extraordinary session passed the farm relief bill which the President wanted. It did not accord with the judgment of farm leaders and farm economists who had devoted a great many years of intensive study to the question. It did not accord with the judgment of Members of Congress who represented agricultural constituencies, but it was the Hoover plan.

If one reads the President's message to this extraordinary session of Congress, he must reach the conclusion that the President entertained no doubt as to the effect of the farm marketing act. He was given a free hand not only in the preparation of the act itself but in the selection of the board which was to administer it. Under the terms of this act the Congress appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 to be used by the Farm Board in carrying out the purpose of the act. This stupendous appropriation from the Public Treasury has been used by the Farm Board, with the approval of the President, in carrying out policies which he dictated. What is the result? The American farmer to-day finds himself in worse condition than in any period in our entire history. Never has his condition been so pitiable and hopeless. Never has the future promised agriculture so little.

Mr. Hoover stated that land was unsalable in 1921. This statement, to say the least, is an exaggeration of conditions. There was a decided temporary depression in land values in 1921; but to-day, if the press of the country is giving us correct information, about 25 per cent of our farmers have been dispossessed of their farms through foreclosures and tax sales. No such condition has existed among our farmers since this Government was organized. Even the reconstruction period following the Civil War did not equal the tax sales and foreclosures in the South of American farms that have occurred during the Hoover administration.

Another item in Mr. Hoover's specifications in 1928 describing conditions in 1921 was, "Our foreign trade ebbed away." Again, the record will show some decline in foreign trade in 1921, but it would in no sense compare with the condition of our foreign trade to-day. I take it that no one will claim that our foreign trade is not in worse plight than at any period since the World War.

Poverty has not in fact been banished from this land. There is not a job for every man. Real estate is not now salable. Our commerce and industry are stagnated. Our foreign trade is virtually destroyed. Eight to ten and a half million people are out of employment. Yet we were assured by Mr. Hoover that the primary purpose of the economic policies which he advocated was to guarantee a job for every man. If every man desiring work had a job, agriculture would not be prostrated; farm lands offered for sale would find purchasers; commerce and industry would be reasonably prosperous; and the staggering deficit with which the Congress must now deal would not exist.

A careful examination of the record of the past three years will show that not a single promise or prophecy of Candidate Hoover has been realized in the administration of President Hoover. Not only do we have unprecedented unemployment, general distress throughout the land which has taxed public charity to the breaking point and made necessary stupendous appropriations of public funds to relieve suffering, but many millions of our citizens are still without the necessities of life. That there is something radically wrong with our economic policies there can be no doubt. I submit that to every candid mind it must be evident that the principal difficulty and one of the major contributing causes to our present unhappy state is the utter lack of leadership which has characterized this administration.

When the impartial historian shall calmly review the history of the Hoover administration, he must reach the conclusion that the present occupant of the White House is the most vacillating, timid, inept, and impractical man who has ever been given the responsibility to lead a democracy in a national crisis. When attention has been called to the President's vacillation, ineptitude, and indefinite attitude, his friends and apologists complain that the President is unjustly criticized. One may excuse the optimism of the President during the "boom period" of 1928 and 1929, but no one can hope to defend successfully the attempted optimism of the Hoover administration following the crash which came in the fall of 1929.

On October 25, following the stock-market crash, President Hoover assured the country that—

> The fundamental business of this country is on a sound and prosperous basis.

On November 21—

> There is no reason why business should not be carried on as usual.

On December 3:

> The sudden threat of unemployment and especially the recollection of the economic consequences of previous crashes under a much less secured financial system created unwarranted pessimism and fear. * * * We have reestablished confidence. Wages should remain stable. A very large degree of industrial unemployment * * * has been prevented.

The last quotation is from the President's message to the Congress.

Then, again, notwithstanding the severity of the depression became more evident, on March 7, 1930, the President stated:

> The low point of business and unemployment was the latter part of December and early January. Since that time employment has been slowly increasing. All the evidences indicate that the worst effects of the crash upon employment will have been passed during the next 60 days.

On May 1, the President again assured the country:

> We have now passed the worst.

On October 2, 1930, the President again speaks to the country:

> The depression is but a temporary halt in the prosperity of a great people. The income of a large part of our people has not been reduced.

On December 2, 1930:

> There are many factors which give encouragement. We have already weathered the worst of the storm.

December, 1931:

> We have fundamental national gains. There has been a distinct gain in public health.

Certainly a large percentage of our people were not at that time suffering from overindulgence in rich foods. This may account for his observation that there had been improvement in the public health.

I have referred to these statements of the President following the crash of 1929 for the purpose of showing that evidently he did not understand the causes contributing to conditions and was, therefore, incapable of dealing with them, or else he did not have the courage or capacity to direct a course which would avoid the pitfalls into which we have unhappily fallen. He can not complain that the Congress has withheld its support and cooperation. When he suggested the international debt moratorium of one year, Members of Congress, without regard to party, gave their assent promptly. Other recommendations have been approved without regard to party.

The President, in his campaign speeches, had repeatedly emphasized the importance of our foreign trade as a means of keeping workmen employed and factories in operation. Yet he approved the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act after the depression had been on for more than six months and there was every evidence that its passage would result in retaliatory enactments by other protesting countries, and this at a time when the outstanding need of our people was to find a profitable foreign market for our surplus goods.

It is true the President recommended in his message to Congress only a limited revision of the tariff, primarily in the interest of agriculture, but had he desired any modification of the provisions of this indefensible tariff there is not the slightest doubt that a word from him would have been sufficient. Had he desired in the first instance a general revision of the tariff, he undoubtedly would have so recommended. He accepted somewhat apologetically the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act and therefore accepted responsibility for the consequences which resulted.

A careful reading of the President's messages to the Congress and his public statements through the press will show an unwillingness to assume responsibility. This is one of the basic qualifications for successful leadership. He is rarely definite in his recommendations. He has had no program. Witness his repeated comments on the necessity of a reorganization of the Government. He says there are overlappings and duplications, resulting in inefficiency and extravagance. He has been in the Government since 1921, and a very important part of its organization. It is well known that his opinions were valued by the two Presidents under whom he served. Surely within this time he has reached some definite conclusion as to how the departments should be reorganized. He should be in a position to name the particular departments which should be abolished and the ones which should be consolidated. He has all the executive and administrative machinery at his command, but at no time has he made a definite and clearcut recommendation upon this subject.

I do not overlook in this connection his message to the Congress February 17, 1932. In this message he says:

> I recommend, therefore, that the Congress provide for—
> (a) Consolidation and grouping of the various executive and administrative activities according to their major purposes under single-headed responsibility, the Congress designating the title of the officer to be placed in immediate charge of such groups as are not now possible under existing organization.
> (b) Adoption of the general principle that executive and administrative functions should have single-headed responsibility and that advisory, regulatory, and quasi-judicial functions should be performed by boards and commissions, thus permitting the transfer of certain regulatory functions from executive officials to existing boards or commissions and executive functions from boards and commissions to executive officials.
> (c) Authority under proper safeguards to be lodged in the President to effect these transfers and consolidations and authority to redistribute executive groups in the 10 executive departments of the Government or in the independent establishments, as the President may determine, by Executive order, such Executive order to lie before the Congress for 60 days during sessions thereof before becoming effective, but becoming effective at the end of such period unless the Congress shall request suspension of action.

He then proceeds to outline a plan which would create a public works administrator, personnel administrator, assistant secretary for public health, assistant secretary for education, assistant secretary for merchant marine, assistant secretary for conservation, assistant secretary for agricultural research, assistant secretary for agricultural economics.

The one thing definite in this message is the creation of additional offices and officers, which the President assures us will result in considerable savings in the cost of the administration. Just how the creation of these additional offices would result in Government economy is more than I can comprehend. If the plan contemplated the abolition of certain Government organizations and a reduction of personnel, why did not the President say so?

Executive leadership should not be expected without a comprehensive and definite program, susceptible always of specific statement.

In his annual message to the Congress in December, 1930, President Hoover, speaking of the antitrust laws, said:

I recommend that the Congress institute an inquiry into some aspects of the economic working of these laws.

I do not favor repeal of the Sherman Act. The prevention of monopolies is of most vital public importance. Competition is not only the basis of protection to the consumer but is the incentive of progress. However, the interpretation of these laws by the courts, the changes in business, especially in the economic effects upon those enterprises closely related to the use of the natural resources of the country, make such an inquiry advisable.

Now, just what interpretation does the President have in mind? What changes in business and what economic effects does he refer to?

In his conclusion on this subject he says:

I therefore suggest that an inquiry be directed especially to the effect of the workings of the antitrust laws in these particular fields to determine if these evils can be remedied without sacrifice of the fundamental purpose of these laws.

Now, he speaks of "particular fields" without having mentioned any fields except in a most general way. He speaks of "these evils," when no evils have been pointed out specifically. This may be language which can be interpreted by an engineer. I should be pleased to have some one undertake a statement of the President's views on this subject after reading the entire paragraph in the message.

I go further and challenge anyone to read all of his public utterances as proof of my assertion of his ineptitude and his incapacity for definite statement. He is no more definite when discussing the antitrust laws than he is when discussing the prohibition amendment to the Constitution. If any person in the United States knows the President's views on the question of national prohibition, I would be pleased to hear from him.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Has not the Senator read the tentative plank that is to go into the Republican platform this week, carried to Chicago from Washington, known as the "country-club plank?"

Mr. TYDINGS. I have read about 15 or 20 tentative planks supposed to be the one that would be adopted; and if the President is the author of these planks, which are changed in their wording from day to day, he is just keeping up in line with the comments and observations I have made on his record heretofore.

Mr. BLAINE. But there is just one "country-club plank" sent from Washington.

Mr. TYDINGS. What is that?

Mr. BLAINE. It has been published in the newspapers.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will not the Senator read it?

Mr. BLAINE. I was not very much interested in it, because it just pretended to do something, and would not effectuate anything if it were adopted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand, then, that after the Senator had read it, being a student of legal phraseology, he himself could not tell what it meant.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator wants an answer, I might say that the only effective way to get prohibition out of the Constitution is to repeal the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I repeat what I said just before the Senator from Wisconsin interrupted; if any person in the United States knows the President's views on the question of national prohibition, I would be more than glad to hear from him. Nobody knows. After 125,000,000 people discussing the subject for three or four years, elections fought out on it—senatorial, congressional, and gubernatorial, even presidential elections—and after everybody in the country has used at least 10,000 words in expressing his opinion on one side or the other of this important question, the great leader, the great engineer who is to lead the country in this crisis, has spoken with so much clarity that nobody knows what he means. It is true he says it is "a noble experiment, far-reaching in purpose, and should be worked out constructively."

For the last several days the press of the country has carried news articles of conferences being held at the White House of Republican leaders, the purpose of which is to determine just what Mr. Hoover's position is to be in reference to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

It seems that the only way the President can determine where he stands on the prohibition question is to confer with a lot of men, and perhaps something will come out of the conferences which will indicate to us where he stands. Detachedly, he can not tell where he stands. The President and his supporters have to sit down, think it over, talk it over, weigh the consequences, the advantages, the disadvantages, and perhaps after a while somebody will find out where he stands. Up to the present no one has been successful.

He has now been President for more than three years. He was Secretary of Commerce for almost eight years. If he has a decided conviction as to what the policy of this country should be in reference to the matter of national prohibition he should make his views known. If he has not formed a definite opinion he can not hope to lead in effecting necessary reforms.

In his message of December, 1929, shortly after the stock-market crash in the previous October, the President said:

I have therefore instituted systematic, voluntary measures of cooperation with the business institutions and with State and municipal authorities to make certain that fundamental businesses of the country shall continue as usual, that wages and, therefore, consuming power shall not be reduced, and that a special effort shall be made to expand construction in order to assist in equalizing other deficits in employment. * * *

I am convinced that through these measures we have reestablished confidence.

This was in December, 1929.

Wages should remain stable. A very large degree of industrial employment and suffering which would otherwise have occurred has been prevented. Agricultural prices have reflected the returning confidence.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], not to get comment from him, but I want him to realize that in December, 1929, the President said—and I quote his exact language:

Agricultural prices have reflected the returning confidence.

In December, 1930, in his annual message, the President said:

As a contribution to the situation, the Federal Government is engaged upon the greatest program of waterway, harbor, flood control, public building, highway, and airway improvement in all our history. * * *

I favor still further temporary expansion of these activities in aid to unemployment during this winter.

That is what he said in 1930. To-day the President is opposed to public works, which he advised the Congress he had initiated in 1930 as a contribution to the situation. He now insists all public expenditures shall be upon self-liquidating or revenue-producing improvements. If the public works which the President indorsed in 1930 would contribute to the relief of the distress of our people incident to the unemployment situation, how does he reach the conclusion that they are very objectionable now? I am not arguing for or against the position taken by the President in 1930 or to-day. In this connection I call attention to the President's recommendation as to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other measures of relief now given White House approval.

Why did the President delay so long the recommendation of these measures? If they are efficacious now in curing the condition in which the country finds itself, surely they would have been effective in ameliorating it. Had these measures been proposed and adopted earlier is it not probable that many bank and business failures might have been prevented? Some one may charge that this is another effort to "smear the President." Such is not my purpose.

The condition of the country to-day is such as to suggest a temporary adjournment of partisan politics, but such a course does not call upon me or any other citizen of the United States to refrain from calling attention to what I conceive to be one of the major causes of our distress—that is, a lack of courageous and constructive leadership in the White House.

It has been repeatedly stated by President Hoover in messages to Congress, as well as statements given to the press, that the Budget estimates submitted to the Seventy-Second Congress had cut appropriations below the fiscal year 1932 by $369,000,000. The fact is that the $369,000,000 is made up of nonrecurring items in appropriations. The Budget did not in fact reduce appropriations by one cent, in so far as the expenses of Government are concerned. Had the President desired the public to know just what the Budget did recommend, he would have stated that there were more than $369,000,000 of nonrecurring items for which no estimates were submitted, but those who have not carefully scrutinized the matter naturally get the impression that the President's Budget has recommended an actual reduction.

If the President had been disinterestedly concerned about balancing the Budget, he would not have found it necessary on Tuesday, May 31, to make a hurried visit to the United States Senate to urge the immediate passage of the bill which he had already been assured was ready for passage and would be passed on the very day he appeared before the Senate. This spectacular performance accomplished its object. It gave the President front-page headlines in the papers, and to some extent impressed the public with the idea that the President had gone to the Senate and had virtually compelled reluctant Senators to yield to the public demand by the immediate passage of necessary revenue legislation. His appearance before the Senate could have no other effect, and since it could have no other effect, I can attribute to it no other purpose. It would have been much better if he had spoken to his representatives in the Senate long before, and had told his senatorial followers not to include the tariff items on copper, oil, coal, and lumber in a revenue bill. These tariff items delayed the passage of the revenue bill several days. These tariff items were inserted and kept in the bill by the President's supporter and party spokesman in the Senate. But no word to take them out came from him. He stood silently by while this outrageous performance was taking place. His request to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman, or to other members of his party on the committee would have accomplished the elimination of these tariffs from the revenue bill. But neither privately nor publicly did he protest. Leadership was lacking. The economic felony was written into the law. The President sat silently by.

What a record of failure, equivocation, and evasion!

First. The Farm Board (Mr. Hoover's major promise to the farmers in 1928) a dismal failure. Cotton now selling at 3½ cents a pound, wheat 45 cents per bushel, and nearly a million farms sold under mortgage foreclosure and for delinquent taxes since Mr. Hoover came in. The $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money appropriated to this board will be lost. Only a small vestige of it will ever find its way back into the Treasury. Yet we have not the courage here to repeal that act, nor does Mr. Hoover recommend that we repeal it, yet he states frankly that his great panacea is an utter and dismal failure. Even now I can hear, coming through the ether, the voices of the campaign orators in 1928, after they had worked the public up to a great tension, after they had worked themselves up to fine flights of oratory. Their words would come over the radio, and one could almost see the speaker, so vividly and clearly did the words ring—and these were the words: "My friends, put this great engineer in the White House and I tell you farmers he will solve your problems." He has! They no longer have any farms to worry them.

Second. There was no leadership on tariff matters. For 18 months while the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was before Congress he was silent but finally signed this document of short-sighted greed, and since grass has commenced to grow on our docks, our world markets are gone, and serious depression is the present topic on all tongues.

Third. His evasion on prohibition is another shining example of his silence. No one knows where the President stands on this all-important question about which there is more interest in all of our national conventions than upon any other subject. Yet he is silent. We read day by day that men are sitting down with him trying to help him make up his mind. Apparently it can not be made up, even upon the facts that exist, upon his own personal conclusions, upon his own governmental background; but it must be made up by advice from this source and advice from that source, of threats from this source and warnings from that source. That is the way our national policies are decided in this hour of national crisis.

And so on, and so on, and so on, we might go through and summarize all of the positions which the President has not taken on important questions. Yet in the face of this record are there still those who feel that he is the man for the times, that Mr. Hoover should be reelected President? If so, then we may look for exactly what we shall get—that is, more floundering about in the slough of misery, poverty, and despair.

One 4-year period of trial should be sufficient to portray to the citizens of the country that their best interests will be served by not reelecting Mr. Hoover to the Presidency. The time for a change has come. Whether or not that change will come will rest upon the results of the election next November; but it should come because an impartial review of the record of the last four years shows that the commodity which we most need to sell and to buy and to have is a quality of vision and frankness and courage, because without that commodity the price of no commodity will ascend in this period of national depression.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 8, to strike out lines 3 to 13, as follows:

When any equalization fee is collected with respect to cattle or swine, an equalization fee equivalent in amount, as nearly as may be, shall be collected, under such regulations as the board may prescribe, upon the first sale or other disposition of any food product derived in whole or in part from cattle or swine, respectively, if the food product was on hand and owned at the time of the commencement of the marketing period: Provided, That any food product owned in good faith by retail dealers at the time of the commencement of the marketing period shall be exempt from the operation of this subdivision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 4, after the words "Title II," to insert the words "The debenture plan."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

ACTION OF FINANCE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' RELIEF BILLS

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this morning during the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] providing for a veterans' committee, some figures were given by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] apparently showing nonaction on the part of the Finance Committee on veterans' bills. I have from the clerk of the committee a statement brought up to date, showing just what has been done with veterans bills by the committee.

There have been 170 veterans' bills referred to the Finance Committee. There have been 99 such bills referred by that committee to subcommittees for consideration and report. Forty-five of those bills, most of which are private bills purporting to give relief to the people who are not entitled to relief under the general law, were reported to the Senate adversely. Six bills were reported to the Senate favorably; 34 bills providing appropriations for additional veterans' administration hospitals in particular locations have been indefinitely tabled by the committee.

When the performance of the Committee on Finance is contrasted with that of the special Veterans' Committee of the other House it is worth while bearing in mind that although this session has been in progress for six and a half months we have, up to date, received from the House only two bills, either special or general, bearing on veterans' relief matters. There is the comparison between the efficiency of the Senate and the so-called efficiency of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I should like to make an observation. I do not know how the figures just cited by the Senator from Pennsylvania may compare with the figures read this morning to the Senate by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. I saw the figures which were compiled for him. That compilation was made by the officials of the American Legion, and I have no doubt as to the accuracy of the figures. In the absence of the Senator from New Mexico, I will say no more. I only wish the Senator from Pennsylvania had made his observation when the Senator from New Mexico happened to be in his seat.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, there are over 70 bills referred to in this report, which have not received any consideration.

Mr. REED. That is true; they have not yet received consideration.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the Finance Committee will be out of a job if jurisdiction of veterans' matters is given to another committee?

Mr. REED. When the Senator says that 70 bills have not been acted on he includes the 34 bills providing special appropriations for particular veterans' hospitals, which have been tabled by the committee. With those added to the 99 bills that have been sent to subcommittees, the committee has acted on 133 out of 170 bills.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Finance Committee has plenty to do without giving any time to the consideration of those bills, has it not?

Mr. REED. Of course, every Senator in this body has plenty to do.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Finance Committee is about the busiest committee on other affairs in the whole Senate, is it not?

Mr. REED. I should not say that. The Committee on Finance is not worked any harder than is the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the only other committee which is worked as hard as is the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1928.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to address some remarks to the bill pending before the Senate at this time. I think it would be very unfortunate if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], in charge of the bill, should attempt to obtain a vote upon it this afternoon. I am sure that the Members of the Senate do not understand the full import of the bill, because they have not had an opportunity to study it. It absolutely revolutionizes trading in agricultural products. It is as far-reaching in its provisions as any legislation now pending before the Congress.

I want to invite the attention of Senators to page 18, where provision is made for the so-called allotment plan, and have them apply the provisions of that section to the transactions in agricultural products in their respective States. Section 14 (a) provides:

> The Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to ascertain and make public the part of the domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption.

Because I know more about cotton than other agricultural products, I digress right here to say that that language, if it were put into the law, would mean that the Farm Board would determine that part of the cotton crop needed for domestic consumption, so that, if in September, when the crop is coming upon the market, the Farm Board should determine that 7,500,000 bales were sufficient for domestic consumption, it would make that announcement. That being so, the bill then provides:

> Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity, as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced.

Of course the cost of the production of cotton differs not only in every State but, as Senators from the cotton States know, it differs in every county in a State and almost on every farm in every county. However, even assuming that the board arrived at an average of the cost of production as between Texas and Oklahoma, on the one hand, where the crop is produced cheaply, as compared with the cost of production in the South Atlantic States, where it costs more, and having arrived at it, announced that one-half of the cotton crop could be sold for the price determined by them, then let us see what would follow:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

By this bill, if enacted, we would give power to a board here in Washington to say that 50 per cent of the cotton crop, determined to be surplus, when it was gathered by the farmer could not be sold for domestic consumption but should be "exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Farm Board except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market."

The cotton farmer in Georgia, having raised 20 bales of cotton and the Farm Board having said that one-half of the cotton crop of America may be used for domestic consumption, the farmer finds that by mandate of the Congress of the United States a board in Washington has the power to say that only one-half of his crop may be sold for domestic consumption. The further provision of the section is:

The portion of any agricultural commodity, produced by any farmer, which may enter commerce for domestic consumption shall bear the same relation to his entire production of such crop in any year as the portion for domestic consumption of the entire crop bears to the total quantity of such crop for the same year.

Therefore the portion of the crop of the farmer in the South which may enter commerce for domestic consumption will bear the same relation to his total crop that the quantity the board says may enter domestic consumption bears to the total crop of cotton. So if a farmer in South Carolina produces 20 bales of cotton and the Farm Board says that only one-half the crop can be sold for domestic consumption, that farmer can not sell more than 10 bales of his 20 bales for domestic consumption. Within sight of his farm there may be a cotton mill; he may need money; his bank may be calling on him to pay the money he owes; but he can not sell his cotton. Every Senator from the South knows the manner in which the cotton crop is marketed. It is produced by advances made to the farmer in the spring. A mortgage is taken over the crop, which becomes due as the crop is marketed in the fall. October 1 comes. The bank calls the farmer. The farmer says, "Mr. Banker, I should like to pay you, but the Farm Board in Washington has said that only one-half of the cotton crop can be sold for domestic consumption, and, having said that, the law says that I can not sell more than one-half of what I have raised. I have 20 bales of cotton. I should like to sell them and pay you, but by the law passed by the Congress of the United States I can not do it. I have it here on my farm. I can sell 10 bales only for domestic consumption. I can not pay you." And if the banker says, "Well, I have a mortgage and I am going to take that crop," when he attempts to foreclose it and take it and sell it he is coming in conflict with the law that the Congress is asked to pass here.

What I want to know is, Where has the Congress of the United States ever been granted the power to say that John Jones, a cotton farmer in South Carolina, having produced 20 bales of cotton and wanting to sell it to his neighbor, the buyer at a cotton mill in the community, can not do it without violating the laws of the United States? By what constitutional power has Congress the right to declare it impossible for a man to sell a commodity which he raised upon his farm?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I can not but believe that the able Senator from South Carolina has misconstrued the operation of this plan. Its operation would be about as follows:

We consume about 60 per cent of the cotton produced in this country. About 40 per cent is exported; or is it the reverse?

Mr. BYRNES. Almost the reverse now.

Mr. HOWELL. About 40 per cent is consumed in this country and 60 per cent is exported.

Let us assume that 50 per cent is consumed in this country and 50 per cent is exported. When the farmer went to a licensed buyer and offered him 20 bales of cotton, the result would be that the licensed buyer would pay the price fixed by the board, which should be the cost of production or less, for that portion entering into domestic consumption. For the other 10 bales the licensed buyer would pay the world price. So whenever a farmer went to market with a quantity of agricultural products which the board attempted to stabilize, he would sell his whole quantity; but for half of it, under the conditions that we have used for illustration, he would receive the cost of production. For the other half he would have to take what the world would pay.

That is the way this bill would operate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have heard the statement of the Senator from Nebraska. First, let me say that the Senator may know something about grain, but he certainly does not understand the operation of the marketing of the cotton crop.

There is not one cotton farmer out of 100 who can ever wait until he has gathered and ginned 20 bales of cotton and then take them to market. As he picks a bale of cotton, and his creditors demand payment, he is forced to market it; and the operation of which the Senator conceives is an impossible one in the cotton-growing section of this country.

Furthermore, the important part is, where in this bill is there any provision giving to the buyer for the cotton mill the power to buy one bale of cotton brought to him by John Jones, pay a certain price for it, and the next day to say, "Well, now, this is your second bale of cotton. You may pick 20. You do not know now. You will not know for 30 or 40 days from now; but I am going to say now that you may pick 20 bales, and therefore I am going to pay you a different price for the second bale of cotton." Is he going to pay more in one instance than in the other? If so, when he pays more, who is going to give him the money?

Mr. HOWELL, Mr. GEORGE, and Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and to whom?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, when he brought one bale of cotton he would receive for one-half of that bale a United States price; that is, the cost of production. For the other half of the bale he would receive the world price. In other words, that would be the way the return for that bale of cotton would be calculated, and it would not make any difference how much cotton he brought to market; the payment would be made on that basis.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask how it would be known, if I were a cotton-grower, whether I sold one-half of my cotton for the domestic price, let us say, and one-half for shipment. Would it not take at least an officer to every cotton grower and to every other farmer to keep up with him, and to know whether he had sold more than the amount specified for domestic consumption?

Mr. BYRNES. Absolutely; and as I proceed to analyze the following section, it provides that any violation of the provisions of the section is a criminal offense, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than six months. Suppose a farmer in Georgia on the 1st day of October thinks that he is going to make 20 bales of cotton. The Farm Board in Washington has announced that he can not sell but one-half of it for domestic consumption. He does not know whether he is going to make 20 bales or not. He could not possibly know in advance. He goes ahead and sells 10 bales, and then it turns out that he did not make 20 bales; that he made only 18 bales. He will be slammed in jail, tried in the United States Court for violation of this law, and soaked $500. If anything more ridiculous has ever been suggested to govern the transactions of the people of the United States, I can not conceive of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Referring to the provision mentioned by the Senator making it a criminal offense, punishable by fine of $500 and/or imprisonment for six months, for a licensee to purchase any agricultural product at a price less than that fixed by the Farm Board, is there any provision in this bill that would compel licensees or others to purchase an agricultural product? And in the event a so-called licensee should be unwilling to purchase at the price fixed by the Farm Board, what would become of that part of the producer's crop which is set apart for sale for domestic consumption?

Mr. BYRNES. He can do nothing but carry it back home and cuss the United States Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, what could he accomplish by that?

Mr. BYRNES. I could make several suggestions to him that might be for the good of the country, but I would not want to express them now. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to know how large a bureau of inspectors and officials it would take to enforce an act of this kind with respect to cotton?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me answer that.

Mr. BYRNES. In answer to the Senator's question, if I may answer it, the thought came to me as the Senator from Arkansas was making the suggestion: Here is the licensee the Senator refers to, who had applied to Washington to get a license to buy cotton out in the country, and here is a farmer's crop maturing in September. Picking it, he brings in 2 or 3 bales of cotton. How could the licensee afford to buy it without knowing what was going to be the total production from that farm? He might buy more than one-half; and if he did, then he would be running the risk of going to jail.

Mr. HOWELL and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield, and to whom?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this is not my bill.

Mr. BYRNES. I am glad to know that. I acquit the Senator. [Laughter.] Whose bill is it? Will the Senator tell me?

Mr. HOWELL. It is the bill of the three agricultural organizations of the country; and when I say it is not my bill I want the Senator to understand that I am not prejudiced because it is my child. I feel, however, that the Senator from South Carolina is unintentionally misconstruing the operation of this bill. I have gone over it very carefully, and this is the situation:

Whatever is brought to market, one half, under the conditions which were stated before—namely, that half of the production of this country is needed for domestic consumption—one half of whatever is brought to market at the time will be paid for at one price, and the other half will be paid for at the world price.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Now the Senator from Nebraska is contradicting the express language of the bill. The language of the bill requires the Farm Board to apportion the product into that part designed for domestic consumption and that part designed for export.

I quote from the bill:

> Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced.

That refers to that portion of the agricultural product which is set apart for domestic consumption.

Continuing the quotation:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

That is the end of the quotation.

Mr. President, instead of permitting the producer to sell a part of his bale of cotton for the domestic price and a part for the world price, as the Senator states, it is expressly provided that he shall not sell that portion which is set apart for export on the domestic market. He can not do the thing that the Senator from Nebraska states without violating the spirit of the law; and if the licensee undertakes to buy that portion which should go into export, he is guilty of a criminal offense and liable to a fine of $500 and imprisonment not exceeding six months.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the difficulty with the Senator from Nebraska is what he has heretofore stated that this is not his bill. He did not draw it, and therefore is not familiar with its provisions; but I should like to know, if he can tell us, who did draw it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. Can the Senator tell us that? I have answered several questions of his.

Mr. HOWELL. I do not know the individual who drew it——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

Mr. HOWELL. But might I add to the statement I have already made, what now becomes of that portion of the cotton crop which is not consumed in this country? It is exported. There is no other place for it, unless there is a surplus that can not be sold abroad. There is a surplus now in this country; but while it is the duty of the Farm Board to determine the domestic consumption and to fix the price at not less than the cost of production, it is also its duty to provide for exportation; so I think the Senator's statement is not fair to what is intended in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not know what was intended, but I know what the bill provides, if the English language can be understood.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BYRNES. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, but I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Assuming that the domestic consumption of cotton is 6,000,000 bales a year, and that there is a production of 15,000,000 bales a year, that leaves 9,000,000 bales for exportation. Now, suppose the cost price of cotton is fixed at 10 cents a pound, and the world price for cotton is 6 cents a pound. The American spinners must pay 10 cents a pound for 6,000,000 bales, while the foreign spinners get 9,000,000 bales at 6 cents a pound. How could the American spinners, for any of their exports, compete with foreign spinners who are getting cotton at 4 cents a pound cheaper than the American spinners?

Mr. HOWELL. Because they could buy the cotton for export, after manufacture, at the world price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Which, I say, would be 6 cents a pound.

Mr. HOWELL. Which would be 6 cents a pound.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is 4 cents a pound less than the price the American spinner pays.

Mr. HOWELL. Than the American spinner pays for that portion of what he purchases to supply the domestic market.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And that is all the purchases, because you would fix the price and make it unlawful to sell below that price.

Mr. HOWELL. Unless he exports it, and there is no other place to dispose of the cotton than by export.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, of course, 6 cents a pound is the price for that export; but remember that the entire amount, under the bill, bought for American consumption by American spinners costs 10 cents a pound.

Mr. HOWELL. Ten cents a pound; therefore the American spinner would have to raise the price of his cotton goods to equal that 10 cents a pound. In other words, what we are trying to do is to give the American farmer a United States price for what he produces in the way of cotton, inasmuch as he must pay a United States price for the things he buys.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But does not the Senator realize that a substantial proportion of the American-consumed cotton, which is merely the cotton spun in America, in the finished goods is shipped and sold abroad?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; and for that portion of the cotton represented by the goods exported, all the spinners would pay would be the world price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. It is not a question of the world price that is provided, but it is the question of the price to be paid to the American producer, which would be 10 cents a pound.

Mr. HOWELL. But if the farmer brings a bale of cotton to market, he gets only the United States price for that portion of the bale consumed in the United States. For the other portion he gets only the world price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How would the cotton buyer know, when a farmer carried him 10 bales of cotton, what proportion, if any, of that particular 10 bales of cotton the cotton buyer would find an American mill to buy and how much of it he would have to ship abroad?

Mr. HOWELL. That is exactly his situation now. If he buys 10 bales of cotton he does not know to whom he is going to sell it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the price is uniform. He would not pay the producer 10 cents a pound without knowing that the entire amount for which he pays 10 cents could be sold to American spinners.

Mr. HOWELL. The amount of cotton consumed in this country is estimated and determined by the board, and it is based upon our consumption. We have to find some way to get the farmer more for his product. He is getting 4 cents a pound for his cotton now.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt, but I agree with the Senator's statement, and everybody agrees with the Senator's statement, that we have to find some way so that the farmer can get more for his cotton, but we will not solve it by providing that he can sell only one-half of what he produces, and if he sells the other half, he will go to jail. We have regulated nearly everything on the earth, some of the things above the earth, and many of the things beneath the earth, and now we are asked to put on the finishing touches and say to a man that when he has raised 20 bales of cotton, he can not sell a bale of that cotton until he finds out the total crop, and then he can sell half of it, but if he sells one bale more than half, he will be put in jail, and if the cotton buyer buys one bale more, he will go to jail.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the Senator this question in behalf of about 25,000,000 farmers. Would they not be much better off in jail to-day than they are on their farms, under the bills passed by the present Congress?

Mr. BYRNES. I agree with the Senator that the situation is terrible, but I can not agree with him that the farmers would rather be in jail. I never have been in jail, except as an attorney visiting somebody who was in jail; but from what I have seen of it, notwithstanding how unpleasant it may be in Washington at various times, I would still rather be out of jail. I do not think any farmer will question that statement.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I might suggest to the Senator that this bill originated with the National Farmers' Union. It has been discussed with that organization for years. When the organization came here this fall and presented some plans for farm relief the ideas of the National Farmers' Union were presented to the Senate drafting service, and the Senate drafting service, working in connection with the representatives of the National Farmers' Union, produced this bill. The bill is not mandatory; it is only permissive. It only suggests a plan whereby the farmers' union and the other farm organizations think that something may be done worth while. It is their plan. That being the way this bill originated, I want to ask the Senator this question. What plan has the Senator for the consideration of the country?

Mr. BYRNES. I will tell the Senator right now. I am in favor of the debenture part of this bill and shall vote for it, but I certainly will never find myself voting for a bill which says, "Here are three propositions, and the Farm Board takes its choice." I would not say that to the Farm Board, of all organizations. The Senator from Oklahoma says it is not compulsory; that it is optional. Optional with whom? Optional with the Farm Board, with the organization which told the cotton farmer that after he had produced his crop he should plow up every third row of cotton, and told the cattlemen to kill every tenth cow? After that experience it is expected that the Congress of the United States will give to that organization the discretion and the power to determine the life and death of the farmers of the United States by the power that is vested in this bill to prevent them from selling what they make.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to inquire, what is to become of perishable farm products in the event of a controversy as to what is the United States price of commodities? For example, the products of the dairy industry exceed in volume and in monetary value the entire cotton crop of this country, and the entire wheat crop of this country. What is to become of the milk of a farmer who sends a hundred gallons to the creamery in town? If there is a controversy over it, he would have to take it back and pour it out into the gutter, or feed it to the hogs.

Mr. BYRNES. No; I will tell the Senator what would happen under the statement of the Senator from Nebraska. When the farmer brought the milk to a prospective purchaser, that man would have to look around to see if there was a Federal agent there. Then he would look at it and say, "Now, you have 10 gallons of milk. For five gallons I will give you the domestic price, and for the other five gallons I am going to give you the world price. Exactly what the world price of the milk is I do not know; but if you will wait until I find out, I will pay you for five gallons at the world price, and for the other five gallons the domestic price."

Mr. GLASS. And in the meantime his 90 gallons will sour, and he will have to pour that portion out.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Going back to the observation of the Senator from Oklahoma, about putting the farmer in jail, the Senator must give up any such thought as that, because there is no room in the jails where the farmers could be placed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I do not think the Senator from South Carolina returned the best possible answer to the Senator from Virginia. In fact, I am a little surprised that as wise a statesman as the Senator from Virginia would have asked such a question. He wants to know what they are going to do about perishable products. Let Congress pass a law that perishable products shall not be perishable. [Laughter.] Let us go to the root of this matter.

I want to add one remark, while I am on my feet. The Senator from South Carolina says this measure is ridiculous; he says it is absurd. He says that a cotton farmer might take his cotton to town and sell it contrary to this act, and become a criminal, and go to jail. If he could not sell his domestic allotment at all in the domestic market, he would have to take it home and hold it.

The Senator from Georgia says this bill is impossible, that it is impossible of execution. There is an old saying that the law takes no account of trifles. I think potent, grave, and reverend Senators are magnifying trifles here. Suppose this measure is an absurdity; what of it? Suppose it is an impossibility; what of that? Let us pass a law that it shall not be an impossibility. I am losing respect for Senators who will permit such trivial consideration as impossibilities to stand in the way of the enactment of a golden dream. [Laughter.] This measure, whether a dream or not, will undoubtedly be vetoed. I am as anxious as anyone to support all practical legislation in behalf of the farmers.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I do want to proceed, but I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia has referred seriously to the matter of perishable products. One of the primary provisions of the bill is that the board must find—

That the durability and conditions of separation, processing, and preserving and the methods of marketing of the commodity are such that the commodity is adapted to marketing as authorized by this section.

That is contemplated by the bill.

I understand that this does not apply generally to all agricultural products. It applies only to a commodity selected after petition by the Federal Farm Board, and they must find that it lends itself to this sort of stabilization. I am merely making this statement so that it may be understood that the bill is not necessarily absurd.

Mr. GLASS. Not necessarily, but actually.

Mr. HOWELL. The allotment plan has great possibilities, and is worthy of study of Senators who are anxious to aid the farmer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. During the course of his remarks the junior Senator from Oklahoma referred to the Senator from South Carolina as having intimated that if the farmer sold his products in violation of the terms of the act, he would be sent to jail. I do not recall any provision in this bill which imposes a penalty on the producer for selling in violation of the act. The only penal provision in the bill is as to the dealer, who is called a licensee. He can not purchase in violation of the act, and if he attempts to do so, he is subject to a penalty.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Arkansas, the language contained on page 18, beginning with line 9, is as follows:

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from the market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I knew of that language.

Mr. BYRNES. In connection with the provision on the next page, which provides that—

Any person, who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, intentionally or knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required pursuant to this section, or intentionally or knowingly makes any purchase in violation thereof, and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am still of the opinion that this language does not penalize the farmer, the producer; that the penalty is limited to the purchaser or licensee. The language has been correctly quoted, but it is noted that—

Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, intentionally or knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required pursuant to this section, or intentionally or knowingly makes any purchase in violation hereof, and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both.

I do not think that means it would be construed by the courts as applying to a case where it says, "it shall not be disposed of except in export." I do not think that is a penal provision. My judgment is that the act limits the penalty to a man who buys and does not impose a penalty on the man who sells.

Mr. BYRNES. The language is:

(3) Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, intentionally or knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required pursuant to this section, or intentionally or knowingly makes any purchase in violation hereof, and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

I want to call attention to the next section:

(2) From time to time, whenever the Federal Farm Board shall find it essential to license the purchase, importation, or storage of any agricultural products in order to carry into effect the purposes of this act, it shall publicly so announce; and after the date fixed in such announcement no person shall engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement unless he shall first obtain a license issued pursuant to this act.

A man should not attempt to store cotton for a cotton farmer in any county in the Cotton Belt after the announcement by the Farm Board unless he gets a license. Then it provides at the end of that section:

It shall be unlawful for any licensee to purchase any agricultural products at a price less than the cost of production proclaimed by the Federal Farm Board.

I have looked in vain through this section for a definition of "agricultural products." I find no definition in this section. Therefore there is doubt as to what it applies to. But if in the State of New Hampshire some farmer should attempt to sell some poultry or some eggs, would that constitute an agricultural product within the meaning of this section? If so, if the merchant in the country to whom they are offered——

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, that would not be an agricultural commodity unless the board had determined that it was a commodity that should be stabilized.

Mr. MOSES. Are they going to stabilize some products and not stabilize all agricultural products?

Mr. HOWELL. There are only certain agricultural products that would be stabilized. They must lend themselves to stabilization and there are certain conditions that must be found by the Federal Farm Board before stabilization shall be resorted to. This does not apply to all agricultural products without a determination of the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me further, we have had a great many propositions for the stabilization of various agricultural products under some of the earlier stabilization acts. As the Senator from Nebraska well knows, I have constantly been complaining because no one of those acts ever contained what I called "them sacred words," to wit, hay, apples, and potatoes, which happen to be staples of New England. Are they to be left out?

Mr. HOWELL. Unless——

Mr. MOSES. Unless the Farm Board in its wisdom puts them in!

Mr. HOWELL. Unless the Farm Board finds they lend themselves to stabilization.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator from Nebraska think the staple products which I have just enumerated are subject to stabilization?

Mr. HOWELL. Hay lasts a long time unless one has some animals to eat it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President it requires only a moment's consideration to determine, from the inquiries that have been propounded here, the impossibility and the impracticability of the proposal. Of course, it comes back to the wisdom of the Farm Board. As the Senator from New Hampshire said, if it is to be left to the Farm Board to determine whether a crop can be stabilized, then we are placing ourselves in the position of saying that the Farm Board is better qualified to exercise wisdom than any other organization in the Government. Of course they have demonstrated it. Whenever we turn over the agriculturists of this country to the Farm Board to determine whether or not their crops shall be stabilized, then we are in a bad way. The board demonstrated their wisdom last September when they called on the cotton farmers about the 1st of September to stabilize cotton by plowing up every third row and by calling upon the farmers of the West to kill every tenth cow. That gives ample proof of their wisdom.

They were given $500,000,000 by the Congress of the United States to stabilize certain products, and the success with which they stabilized it is known to all men. When they were presented with that fund, cotton was selling for 18 cents. They stabilized it, and it is selling now for 4 cents. They gave relief to the farmer by relieving the farmer of the farm he formerly owned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to something that happened before the Appropriations Committee, I believe in his presence, just a few days ago. The Senator will recall that we have appropriated for the Farm Board up to this time some $500,000,000. The Committee on Appropriations had occasion to ascertain the unexpended balance now in the hands of that board. The report was given to us that they now have $591,082.26. That is all they have left out of the $500,000,000. The question that arises, in my opinion, with all the other expenditures and with this rapid expenditure of the people's money, is, Where in the world are they going to get the funds unless the Congress appropriates more money for them to carry out the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, it is true that the farmers of the United States have lost confidence in the wisdom of the Farm Board. All Members of Congress who are at all familiar with the situation in their respective districts know the attitude of the farmers toward the Farm Board. Just at this time to propose that there should be intrusted to the Farm Board the power to determine what crops shall be stabilized, how much of a crop shall be sold, and how it shall be marketed, when thoughtful people believe the board should be abolished, is a most extraordinary thing.

I have here just a little evidence of the ways in which the board expends the money which we appropriate to it. Any Senator can find out what is being done by them. Just before the Congress met last fall it was evident there was a demand from the farmers of the United States that the Farm Board should be abolished. Then the publicity agents of the Farm Board got busy. Here is one statement they sent out:

Agricultural marketing act helps farmers of Oregon. Do not publish before noon, Wednesday, October 14, 1931.

That was for the benefit of the Oregon newspapers. Here is one of November 5:

Farmers of Wyoming are aided by agricultural marketing act.

That was for the newspapers of Wyoming. It is prepared at the expense of the taxpayers and sent for publication in Wyoming. Then, the next one:

Colorado farmers use the aid offered them in agricultural marketing act.

Then California was not to be neglected, and the next one is:

Agricultural marketing act helps farmers of California.

That was November 2. On November 19 they issued one for Utah:

Agricultural marketing act aids Utah farmers in organized marketing.

If Senators would read these statements, they would find they were all very much alike. The State colleges and extension forces and vocational agencies are aiding in carrying on the work.

Then another one:

Idaho farmers are making progress under cooperative marketing.

The Farm Board, at the expense of the taxpayers, prepared mimeograph statements to send to Idaho to give them the information that they were progressing. The same is true of Montana:

Agricultural marketing act aiding farmers in Montana.

Then there was one with reference to the farmers in the State of Washington:

Washington farmers are helped under agricultural marketing act.

Let us see what they do. Millions have been loaned to the cooperatives by the Farm Board.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator leaves the point of publicity I would like to say that the American Cotton Cooperative Association also issued instructions to cotton farmers suggesting that they appeal to their Senators and Congressmen. In the instructions they indicated what sort of headlines should be used in newspaper work, and went so far into detail as to suggest that the farmers write their letters with lead pencils instead of pens, that it would be more effective when received by the statesmen. I have a copy of those instructions.

Mr. BYRNES. In every State in the Union high-powered propaganda has been resorted to. Whenever any Member of the Senate or House would have the temerity to make a statement that the Farm Board should not lend money to the cooperatives when the cooperatives were going to pay salaries of $75,000 a year to a cotton man, $50,000 a year to a grain man, $30,000 to a treasurer, and $25,000 to this man and $20,000 to another man, he brought down upon his head the wrath of the board. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] rose and in a thoughtless moment made the statement that the payment of such salaries at this time was nothing but legalized graft. He provoked great resentment of the gentlemen who had been able to borrow at will and with great freedom and liberality from the Farm Board. Some of them are quite effective. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to how effective they are.

There is one gentleman from the Northwest who testified before the Appropriations Committee and in order that the Senator may know how effective he is and what we might expect upon this bill, I would like to read what he said he was able to do at the other end of the Capitol:

The House was by no means unanimous that this appropriation should be cut; the vote on the floor of the House was 120 to raise the appropriation to $1,380,000, and 123 against it, and I know of 7 votes that were pledged to the raise that were absent on account of sickness, and could not be there. Had those votes been there, the bill would have passed carrying that amount.

Senator BYRNES. How did you learn that?

Mr. HOLMAN. They had pledged themselves. We had lobbied.

Senator BYRNES. There were several representatives there?

Mr. HOLMAN. As representatives of the farmers' group, and we are proud of the fact that we could come here and tell the Congress our problems.

Senator BYRNES. And they were pledged in advance?

Mr. HOLMAN. They agreed to support the increases in the House. We saw them personally and they promised us that they would vote for it, and unfortunately they were absent.

Senator BYRNES. Was there quite a bit of lobbying at the time?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; there was, and I did a lot of it myself.

Senator BYRNES. And you got how many besides the seven that you got who did not attend; how many did you get to vote?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, the vote was 243 votes.

Senator BYRNES. In the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. In the Committee of the Whole.

That shows his familiarity with parliamentary procedure in the House.

Senator BYRNES. And you did not get all of them?

Mr. HOLMAN. We got 120 of those votes.

Senator BYRNES. You feel that you got that many?

Mr. HOLMAN. Only on their statement.

Senator BYRNES. How do you know?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that I might safely say, that outside of Pennsylvania, a majority of the agricultural Congressmen, from the dairying districts, voted with us.

Senator BYRNES. You say they are with you now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes. We have no representation south of Tulsa, Okla.

Senator BYRNES. You said that you had seven pledges. How many——

And he interrupted to say:

That would have been enough to have passed the bill.

Senator BYRNES. Did you have enough to pass it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I personally did not; no.

Senator BYRNES. You got those pledges, and they did not vote. That was rather unfortunate?

Mr. HOLMAN. Very unfortunate for us.

Senator BYRNES. Every man that you got pledged failed to turn up?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I beg your pardon. I did not understand your question.

Senator BYRNES. I thought that was what you said.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand you. I am referring only to seven absent votes.

Senator BYRNES. You said that you had seven pledged who were absent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Senator BYRNES. I asked you if you had any pledged who were present and voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Many of them.

Senator BYRNES. Many of them?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Senator BYRNES. How many of them did you say?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I could not specify, but I might say that we carried the dairying districts.

Senator BYRNES. Do you think that you had as many as 50 pledged?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think so; more than that.

I told him he was good.

In order that the Senate may be informed of what was happening here, I will say that that testimony came from the dairying district.

Then another witness came; and whenever anything affecting the expenditures of the Farm Board is pending there is present this gentleman, and another was Mr. C. O. Moser, representing the American Cotton Association. He appeared and made a statement. I asked if he would mind telling how much he got from the association, and he said $15,000 a year. He has been in the city of Washington, according to his testimony, before the House committee, since last December in the interest of his association, and is of the firm belief, as he expressed it, that he is fully able to advise the Congress what to do. The taxpayers are lending money to the cooperatives and they are paying that money to a lobbyist to stay in Washington to lobby Congress for more money.

Now, with that record of extravagance, I want to know what justification is there for the Congress at this time turning over to the Farm Board the power to determine what crops shall be stabilized and how they shall be stabilized?

Mr. President, we may as well understand that if the President of the United States is going to exercise any power under the terms of the so-called economy bill, he owes it to the people of America to consolidate the Farm Board with the Department of Agriculture. We have now two departments of agriculture; we have the Department of Agriculture sending out bulletins and information of all kinds, telling the farmers in many instances how to produce crops; and we have the Farm Board telling them a different story. We have a Bureau of Agricultural Economics in the Department of Agriculture, and several million dollars are appropriated each year for it; and we have an agricultural economics bureau on Pennsylvania Avenue, under the control of the Federal Farm Board, with a number of officials drawing salaries of $4,000, $5,000, and $6,000 a year. The farmers know they are receiving no service from the Farm Board.

The Farm Board will contend because it has made a loan to some cooperative, it should be continued. Well, if it did not make a loan now and then to a cooperative out of all the money that has been appropriated, what excuse could it have for existence at all?

I have contended that, so far as the cooperative marketing features of the bill are concerned, they should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture; that the Department of Agriculture should be given authority to exercise all powers with reference to cooperative marketing; that all powers should be taken away from the Farm Board as to the stabilization of agricultural products; that the Farm Board should be abolished, and that we should put an end to the opportunity to lend the money of the taxpayers to organizations that pay men whom they employ as much as $75,000 a year.

I think it was the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] who when the Agricultural Committee was considering this matter last November asked one of the officials of the Farm Board if he knew what the average income of the cotton farmer was this year. The answer was $300. He then asked the official to whom I have referred, "What is your salary?" The answer was "$75,000." That salary was fixed, and it has continued. If anything has been done, if any influence has been wielded by the Farm Board to force the cooperatives who have been borrowing money of the taxpayers from the Farm Board to reduce such salaries, we have not as yet heard of it. At a time when we have been for ten days considering a measure reducing the salaries of Government employees in every department of the Government, and there has been considerable opposition to enforcing a cut of even 10 per cent, we find one organization failing to do a thing to bring about a reduction of a salary of $75,000 paid to a man to handle the cotton owned by the American Cooperative Association, and failing to reduce the salary of another man handling grain who is receiving $50,000 a year.

Mr. President, I hope there will be no vote upon this measure to-night. As I said a while ago, I am in favor of the debenture provision, and if anyone offers an amendment to this bill striking out the equalization fee and striking out the allotment feature which the farmers of the country have never heard of, thus bringing this question to a head, I shall vote for the debenture plan and vote to strike out the other two provisions of the bill; and I hope that such a motion will prevail.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, looking over the Senate, I see Senators who have been Members of this body for 10 years, 20 years, and even a quarter of a century. What we have to-day is the result of your management of public and economic affairs. I call your attention to conditions as they exist. Oats of the farmer are selling for 8 cents a bushel, cotton for 4 cents a pound, and wheat for 30 cents a bushel.

I pause, Mr. President, to ask what do these Senators who have been here for these long years, and who are opposing this bill, propose in the way of a relief measure for the farmers of the Nation? I know they go out in a campaign year and beg this largest group for votes, promising them "If you will elect me to office or place my party in power we will give you relief and economic equality; we will raise the price of your commodities; we will give you salvation." They have failed to do so. I pause now to ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] what is his plan for the relief of the farmers of the Nation?

Mr. BYRNES. I just told the Senator that I am in favor of the debenture plan which is in this bill, I am going to vote for it, and I understand the motion will be made to strike out the allotment plan. With that plan and the equalization fee stricken out, I will vote for the debenture plan.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Virginia what are his plans for assistance to the farmers?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will respond by saying that I have not done anything much since I have been in Congress except to establish agencies through which the farmer may run into debt, and neither the Senator from Oklahoma nor I nor any other Senator has undertaken to keep him out of debt.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should now like to ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee what is his plan for assistance of the farmers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I previously voted for the debenture, and I expect to vote for it again, but I wish to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that, while I voted for the establishment of the Farm Board and authorized it to use $500,000,000, I think it was the greatest mistake I ever made. I do not believe the Federal Farm Board by the expenditure of the entire $500,000,000 has ever done the farmer any good; and I believe that it has wasted or gambled away on future exchanges a greater part of that $500,000,000; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to vote any more money into the hands of the Farm Board. I would rather vote to abolish the Farm Board.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Georgia likewise opposes this bill. I pause to inquire what is his solution of the problem of the farmers of the Nation?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if the farmers would get rid of the Senate and get rid of all the nostrums that have been proposed for his benefit in the past, most of which have literally undone him, he would be infinitely better off.

I have always stood, and I expect to stand more firmly in the future, for a fair chance for the farmer, for equal rights to the farmer; but I am opposed to any of the burdens that we have placed on him from time to time by virtue of the tariff or in any other way.

Mrs. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the Chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield.

Mrs. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I should merely like to read a telegram which I have received to-day from the State which I have the honor in part to represent. It is as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., June 13, 1932.

Mrs. HATTIE CARAWAY,
Senate Office Building:

I see by the Gazette you fellows up there plan on again trying to help us farmers. The Farm Board has about ruined us. For goodness sake, let us alone and allow us to work out our own salvation. If you want really to help us, let us alone, do away with what you have already done.

C. N. ALEXANDER.

I should like further to say that when my late husband was a Member of the Senate he voted against establishing the Farm Board in the first place.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to suggest to the Senator that a Democratic bill passed by a Democratic Congress and signed by a Democratic President actually gave the farmers the cost of production for their wheat. That bill was passed on the 4th of March, 1919, and there is not any question about it working or being effective. So if Senators are not satisfied with this bill, why not take up that old Democratic bill and reenact it and at once fix the price of agricultural products at cost of production plus a reasonable profit to the farmer? That is what that bill did; it did it by absolutely monopolizing the surplus, and it gave the farmers a price that made them prosperous, probably the most prosperous price they ever had in this country. I have drawn a bill, being Senate bill 1230, on the basis of that old Democratic bill, and I will be glad to offer it, if we can agree to it, as a substitute for the pending bill.

Further, I should like to say that so far as the allotment plan is concerned, its original author was William G. McAdoo. I put in the RECORD the facts about that. Let me state further that that plan will work pretty well; the criticisms of it are not justified when it is fully understood. It is, however, a Democratic idea, coming from one of the most distinguished Democrats in the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahome yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me say, before yielding, that this bill sets up a declaration of policy, and that policy is to secure for the farmers at least the cost of production.

Now I want to yield to any Senator, if there be one, who is opposed to such a policy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. What I suggest is that inasmuch as the Senator from Iowa, who is a well-known friend of the farmer, has a bill, and as various other bills are probably before the committee, and there are three alternate plans in this bill, why would it not be better to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to report a bill that might do the farmers some good?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator a moment ago that he might give his interpretation of the kind of a bill that would do the farmer some good, and I received no satisfactory response.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahome yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the absence of any other remedy, what does the Senator think about a suggestion by the late Bob Taylor, of Tennessee, made in 1896, when he was running for office in the midst of a campaign involving the money question, which he had not discussed? During one of his speeches somebody in the audience asked him where he stood on the money question, and he said he was for a little more gold, for a little more silver, for a little more greenbacks, and a sprinkling of counterfeit. Does the Senator think that sort of a remedy might meet our present situation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the counterfeit part applies admirably to the relief that the Congress has given the American farmer. That is all he has gotten to date.

This issue of relief for agriculture has been before the Congress for years, and the Congress is presumed to be made up of men selected from the country who can solve a governmental problem. Is the farm problem impossible of solution? Perhaps it is. The Congress has no plan to suggest to the people of America; and now the farmers themselves come with their plan—which is not mandatory, which is not directory, only permissive—and Senators who have been here for a quarter of a century, having nothing to suggest themselves, make fun of it.

Mr. President, let me call attention to a news item that appeared in a recent paper. I have here an item that reads as follows:

The 1926 dollar worth $1.52, survey shows.

Purchasing power increased more than half, Labor Department calculation shows.

Your dollar now will buy half again as much goods in the wholesale markets as in 1926, the Department of Labor computes. Using 1926 as the basis of calculation, the department figures that the present purchasing power of the dollar in terms of all commodities is $1.52.

Present purchasing power of the 1926 dollar in buying various things at wholesale prices is given as follows:

Food	$1.63
Farm products	2.03
Boots and shoes	1.31
Fuel and light	1.42
Autos	1.06
Building material	1.39
Household furnishings	1.31

The Labor Department's general average of wholesale prices now stands at 65.5, compared with 100 in 1926, and 69.8 in 1913. It has declined nearly 10 points in the last 12 months. The April decline was one-half of 1 point.

Mr. President, if this news story correctly interprets the conditions, the farmer's dollar to-day buys twice as much as it bought only back yonder in 1926, and then the dollar bought more than it bought in 1917. It bought more than it bought in 1913. Is it any wonder that the farmers can not pay their bills, can not pay their interest, can not pay their taxes, and farms everywhere are being lost to their owners?

I want to put some other figures in the RECORD.

In 1926, the basis of this news story, the cotton crop of America brought to the farmers the sum of $982,000,000. This year it is estimated to bring them $280,000,000—a loss of $702,000,000 to the cotton farmers of the South.

In 1926 wheat brought to the farmers of America $995,000,000. This year it is estimated to bring them $320,000,000—a loss of $675,000,000 to the farmers of the country.

In 1926 the corn crop brought to the farmers $1,729,000,000. This year it is estimated that the corn crop will bring them $400,000,000—a loss of $1,329,000,000.

In 1926 the farmers received from these three commodities alone the sum of $3,708,000,000. This year it is estimated that they will receive $1,000,000,000. Subtract the amount they will probably receive this year from the amount they did receive in 1926 and the farmers of America will suffer a loss in the sum of $2,708,000,000.

What plan has the Congress to improve the prices of commodities of the farmers of the country?

Over on the House side, a bill was passed in the form of instructions to the Federal Reserve Board to raise commodity prices. When that bill came to this body, one of our largest and most responsible committees substituted another bill in the nature of a substitute. This is one way to kill the Goldsborough bill—a nice piece of parliamentary strategy. It will do it effectively, perhaps, unless we can get the Goldsborough bill up on the floor for consideration, then strike out the substitute, and pass the original Goldsborough bill. I am not sure that that will be done. I should favor that policy. I hope that at some time before this session of Congress adjourns we can reach the so-called Goldsborough bill, and when we do I hope a motion will be made to strike out the committee amendment; and if that is done I shall support the bill. If the committee amendment is stricken from the bill, then I will support the original Goldsborough bill in the hope of having the Congress set forth a definite policy as to the value of money.

The Constitution provides that the Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof. The Congress has delegated this authority to the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board is proceeding to regulate the value of money; and to get a dollar farmers must produce and sell $2.03 in farm commodities. The farmers must produce $2.03 of wheat, of corn, of cattle, of cotton, of tobacco, of apples, of hay, even, in New Hampshire to get a dollar.

The Federal Reserve Board has undertaken, so it claims, to regulate the value of money. The policy that the board has pursued is what is known as open-market operations in the buying of Government bonds. The board has been buying Government bonds now for about 12 weeks. The board has bought over $700,000,000 of Government bonds. The board has paid for those bonds with Federal reserve notes; and to-day there is less money in circulation than there was when the board started its open-market operations.

In other words, the Federal Reserve Board has placed in circulation $700,000,000 of Federal reserve notes; and just as soon as those notes were placed in circulation the banks got them and sent them back to the Federal reserve to pay off their obligations; and the result is that now there is approximately $200,000,000 less money in circulation than there was when the year began.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD some other figures.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that set of figures, will he yield to me for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I gladly yield.

Mr. MOSES. I have been much interested in what the Senator has said about the value of the farmer's dollar, and he quoted two sets of figures—one from the Department of Labor with reference to the unit of value in the purchase of farm products. As I remember, it was $2.03 as against the value of the dollar in 1926.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. MOSES. Then, as I remember, the Senator quoted certain figures with reference to the value of the farm crops in 1926 and the value of the farm crops in the last year. The percentages did not seem to me to agree. May I ask the Senator to repeat those figures?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does the Senator mean in the Department of Labor's statistics?

Mr. MOSES. No. The total value of farm crops, as I remember, fell off about $2,000,000,000 from a total of about $7,000,000,000. Possibly my memory is inaccurate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. According to this statement the total loss would be $2,700,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The figure of 1926.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; and that figure was how much?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Three billion seven hundred and eight million dollars. This estimate is given by a Mr. Frankel, of New York City. I have no means of knowing whether or not his estimate is correct, because the crops of this year are not yet made. These are estimates only.

Mr. MOSES. It does not seem to me, if I may say so to the Senator, that the two sets of figures hang together. That is to say, there is an increase of more than 100 per cent in one instance—that is, from a dollar flat to $2.03—and there is a decrease from three billion to two billion in the other instance, which is only a third. I wonder how the Senator reconciles the two sets of figures.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. For example, in 1926 the cotton crop was actually sold for a little less than $1,000,000,000. At that time cotton was selling for 20 cents a pound. The estimate this year is for $280,000,000. At the present time cotton is selling for 5 cents a pound. That is one-fourth the price of cotton in 1926, and that is approximately correct.

Mr. MOSES. That is a diminution of 75 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

In 1926 wheat was selling for $1.50 a bushel. At that time it brought approximately $1,000,000,000. At the present time wheat is selling on the exchange for 50 cents per bushel, and the estimate here is for $320,000,000, which is one-third. So I think if the Senator will take these figures and check them over, he will find that they check out fairly well.

Mr. MOSES. I can not see that, because the increased value of the dollar as the Senator stated it in his first set of figures was 103 per cent. That is very different from either one-third as applied to the wheat crop or 75 per cent as applied to the cotton crop.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In order for a farmer to secure a dollar now he has to deliver two to four times as much of his products as in 1926; and when he comes to pay his taxes, his interest, or his debts, he finds that debts have not decreased, but instead his taxes have been greatly increased.

Mr. MOSES. In other words, the Senator is attempting to measure the expenditures of the farmer in terms of the farmer's product.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the farmer has nothing with which to buy excepting his commodities. The wheat farmer pays all of his bills with wheat. The cotton farmer pays all of his bills with cotton. He pays his taxes with cotton. He pays his interest with cotton. He pays his debts with cotton. He buys his clothes, he buys his shoes, his hats, everything that he buys, he pays for with cotton. It is his medium of exchange.

Mr. MOSES. Now, the Senator is bringing his argument down to a point where my intellect can comprehend it. It was when the Senator was dealing in terms of figures alone that I became misled.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to incorporate in the RECORD at this point some other figures, to show the trend of the times.

In 1929, the securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange were estimated to be worth $223,000,000,000. At some point in 1932 they were estimated to be worth $85,000,000,000; showing a shrinkage of listed securities on the New York Stock Exchange in the sum of $138,000,000,000.

The inventory of all commodities in 1929 was estimated to be worth $45,000,000,000. The same inventories in 1932 were estimated to be worth $32,000,000,000—a loss in commodity inventories of $13,000,000,000.

Bank deposits in 1929 totaled $55,000,000,000. In 1932 they totaled $49,000,000,000. They are now only about $45,000,000,000. But, using those figures, they show a shrinkage in bank deposits in the sum of $6,000,000,000.

Since 1929, until 1932, we have had 3,600 bank failures, with a total loss of $2,000,000,000. Since 1929 we have had 60,000 business failures, causing a total loss of $2,000,000,000. Since 1929 we have had a default in real-estate bonds in a total sum of $6,000,000,000. This makes a total shrinkage in values resulting from this depression to date of $167,000,000,000.

The annual production of all goods by mines, factories, and farms in 1929 was $88,000,000,000. Based upon the first-quarter reports of 1932, they are now worth $37,000,000,000. There is a shrinkage of $51,000,000,000.

Salaries and wages in 1929 were $49,000,000,000. This year they are reduced to $26,000,000,000; which makes a shrinkage in salaries of $23,000,000,000.

Dividends, interest, and profits received in 1929 were $41,000,000,000. In 1932 the estimate is for $19,000,000,000, making a shrinkage there of $22,000,000,000.

Add these three items together, and we have a total reduction in buying power of $96,000,000,000 per year.

Mr. President, when we check up on the losses in listed securities, inventories, bank deposits, bank failures, business failures, defaulted real-estate bonds, and add to that the losses of the farmer, it is no wonder that we now have 10,000,000 men out of employment.

Mr. President, everyone agrees that until the farmer's situation is improved the position of no other citizen can possibly be improved. No help can come to the merchant until the farmer is helped. Unemployed can not receive wages until the farmer is benefited, because wages are paid to the unemployed to create manufactured articles, in the main, and the largest class of consumers of manufactured articles are the farmers. Until the farmers have buying power they can not buy. Until they can have buying power there can come no relief to the factories. So, after all, as I see it, until the farmer is helped, the downward trend will continue.

Congress has no other plan to help the farmer. If it has, I know not of it. The three great farm organizations have come before the Congress, the House and the Senate, and presented three plans, the debenture plan, the equalization-fee plan, and the allotment plan. They have not asked the Congress to make these plans mandatory. They have not asked the Congress to require the Federal Farm Board to place either of these three plans in operation. They have asked that the Congress pass a bill giving the Farm Board these three additional powers. The power that is under discussion at the present time is the allotment plan. As I have said, that is only permissive. This plan does one thing. It sets forth a principle, and that principle is that the farmers must have the cost of production. Then it gives the Federal Farm Board the right to make rules and regulations, subject to restrictions set forth in the section, to bring into effect the cost of production.

Mr. President, I will not insist, of course, that the bill be brought to a vote to-night. I realize that the allotment plan has received but scant consideration at the hands of the Senate, but I hope the bill will be kept before the Senate until it can be thoroughly considered, and in the end receive the approval of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 18, line 1, after "Title III," to insert "The Allotment Plan"; on line 15, after the word "commerce," to strike out the words "at a price per unit not less than the cost of production," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "for domestic consumption"; on line 17, after the word "to," to strike out the word "the," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "his"; on the same line after the word "crop," to strike out the words "by such farmer"; in line 18, after the word "the," to strike out the words "quantity of such crop in the Nation as a whole which enters commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "portion for domestic consumption of the entire crop," so as to make the paragraph read:

TITLE III—THE ALLOTMENT PLAN

SEC. 14. (a) The Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to ascertain and make public the part of the domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption. Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced. The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market. The portion of any agricultural commodity, produced by any farmer, which may enter commerce for domestic consumption shall bear the same relation to his entire production of such crop in any year as the portion for domestic consumption of the entire crop bears to the total quantity of such crop for the same year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This concludes the amendments of the committee.

PRINTING IN RECORD OF SPEECHES OF CHAIRMEN AND PLATFORMS OF MAJOR PARTIES IN NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speeches of the temporary and permanent chairmen as well as the platforms of the two major parties in the national conventions of this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 429) to amend section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932, and it was signed by the Vice President.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mr. VANDENBERG (for Mr. WATERMAN), from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on to-day, June 13, 1932, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) extending for one year the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the settlement of war claims act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and of the Tripartite Claims Commission.

WAGES OF LABORERS AND MECHANICS ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3847) to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the proposed substitute be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the House will be read by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed on public buildings of the United States and the District of Columbia by contractors or subcontractors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1931, is amended to read as follows:

"That the advertised specifications for every contract in excess of $5,000 for construction, alteration, and/or repair, including painting and decorating, of public buildings or public works, except shipbuilding, in the District of Columbia, the Canal Zone, or in any city, town, village, or other civil subdivision of any State or Territories to which the United States or the District of Columbia is to become a party and which requires or involves the employment of mechanics or laborers shall contain a provision stating the prevailing rate of wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor for various grades of mechanics and laborers for work of a similar nature in the District of Columbia, the Canal Zone, or in the city, town, village, or other civil subdivision of any State or Territories in which all or the principal part of the particular contract work is located, and every contract for the construction of public buildings or public works, except shipbuilding, to which the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Panama Canal shall become a party shall contain a stipulation that the contractor and his subcontractors shall pay the mechanics and laborers employed directly on the site of such work at not less than the rate of wages stated in the advertised specifications. The books and pay rolls of the contractor and his subcontractors shall be so kept as to show the actual wages paid mechanics and laborers, and shall be open to inspection by an authorized officer or employee of the United States, or the District of Columbia, respectively.

"SEC. 2. Any contractor or subcontractor who fails to pay not less than the rate of wages stated in the advertised specifications and made a part of the contract, or who, after making proper payment, requires a laborer or mechanic to refund any part of the wages so paid, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $10 per day per laborer or mechanic for every day any laborers or mechanics are paid less than such prevailing rate of wages, and for each such refund required from any mechanic or laborer shall forfeit to the United States a sum not less than five times the value thereof. Any laborer or mechanic employed on any such work who accepts a rate of wages less than that prescribed in the advertised specifications, or who makes any refund to the contractor or subcontractors shall, within 10 days after such payment or refund, file a sworn statement with the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, setting forth the facts, and any amounts to be forfeited as provided in this section shall be deducted by the Comptroller General or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, from any sums due the contractor from the United States or the District of Columbia, respectively, or if nothing remains due the contractor, such amounts may be recovered by the United States or the District of Columbia, respectively, as a debt in a suit at law against either the contractor and his surety or his subcontractors. The amount so forfeited or recovered shall be applied, first, to the payment to the laborers and mechanics of any difference between the amounts found by the Comptroller General or said commissioners, respectively, to have been paid them and the prevailing rate of wages, or of the amounts which such laborers and mechanics were required to refund, and the balance shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, if the contract be with the United States, or to the credit of the District of Columbia if the contract be with the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 3. When any of the departments or independent establishments of the United States, including the District of Columbia, perform work by Government plan and hired labor which could have been performed under contract, but not including work in arsenals or navy yards, or work performed by the Panama Canal, such departments and establishments, including the District of Columbia, shall also pay not less than the prevailing rate of wages established by the Secretary of Labor at the time the work is undertaken: Provided, That in case of national emergency the President is authorized to suspend the provisions of this act."

SEC. 2. If the provisions of section 1 of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, shall be held invalid, the act of March 3, 1931, or the application thereof to any such person or circumstances, as the case may be, shall not be affected by the enactment of this act.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect 30 days after its passage but shall not affect any contract then existing or any contract that may thereafter be entered into pursuant to invitations for bids that are outstanding at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he will not let the matter go to conference.

Mr. METCALF. I rose for the purpose of making that motion.

I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. METCALF, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. COPELAND conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12443, the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 17, after line 5, insert the following:

"Indian agency buildings: For construction of a power-transmission line and distribution system, including purchase of equipment and necessary rights of way, Walker River Agency, Nev., fiscal year 1933, $17,000."

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

AMENDMENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there are certain amendments which I am sending to the desk, all formal amendments, for correction of the text, and so forth, except the amendment which applies to page 15 of the bill. On that page is found a provision for the raising of revenue, which should not be in a bill originating in the Senate, and therefore it is proposed that that provision be stricken from the bill. I offer these amendments.

Mr. MOSES. Let the amendments be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska offers the following amendments: On page 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out "section 5" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 7 and 9."

On page 3, strike out lines 5 to 14, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the board, after publicly declaring its findings, shall arrange to secure the cost of production for that portion of the commodity sold in the domestic market by means of such plan or plans hereinafter authorized in Titles I, II, and III as in the opinion of the board will be most effective for such purpose; and such plan or plans shall continue in operation until such time as the board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy declared by section 1."

On page 3, strike out lines 16 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 12. The board is authorized and directed to enter into marketing agreements with cooperative associations engaged in handling any commodity as to which the plan set forth in this title is in effect or with corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations. Each such agreement shall provide either.

On page 6, line 9, strike out "(b)"; on page 9, line 13, strike out "(a)"; on page 9, line 16, strike out "(b)"; on page 9, line 22, strike out "(c)"; and on page 10, line 4, strike out "(d)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether he is offering these amendments for the purpose of having them printed, or does he desire to have them considered at this time?

Mr. HOWELL. I desire to have them considered and adopted at this time. They are merely formal amendments.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Costigan	Kean	Oddie
Bankhead	Dale	Keyes	Patterson
Barbour	Davis	King	Pittman
Barkley	Fletcher	La Follette	Reed
Blaine	Frazier	Logan	Robinson, Ark.
Brookhart	George	McGill	Schall
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Sheppard
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Shipstead
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Shortridge
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Caraway	Hayden	Neely	Vandenberg
Cohen	Howell	Norbeck	White
Connally	Hull	Norris
Coolidge	Johnson	Nye

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the amendments?

Mr. HOWELL. I ask that the amendments, except that on page 15, be adopted en bloc for the reason that they are formal amendments correcting the text, but the one on page 15 changes the effect of the bill, and I will ask that that be read after the other amendments are disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. All the amendments which the Senator proposes to adopt en bloc are merely corrections?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will explain the amendments.

Mr. HOWELL. I propose to explain the amendment on page 15 when the other amendments are adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to indicate one or two of the amendments which he states are merely clarifying so we may determine just how far clarification is effectuated or whether they go beyond mere clarification.

Mr. HOWELL. For instance, on page 3, I propose to strike out lines 5 to 14, inclusive, and insert the following:

The board, after publicly declaring its findings, shall arrange to secure the cost of production for that portion of the commodity sold in the domestic market by means of such plan or plans hereinafter authorized in Titles I, II, and III, as in the opinion of the board will be most effective for such purpose; and such plan or plans shall continue in operation until such time as the board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy declared by section 1.

The purpose of this amendment is to eliminate the implication that the board may act without making a finding that each of the four conditions precedent exists and to require the board to put into effect the plan or plans which in its opinion will be most effective.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, it seems to me, if the Senator will permit me, that that goes much further than a mere clarifying amendment. It seems to me to change very materially the functions of the board as proposed in the original bill and possibly to add to their powers and certainly to remove the limitation of time that might exist as to the period during which their findings would hold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the apparent and manifest change in the bill that this amendment makes, I think we had better consider the amendments separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made and the clerk will report the first amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out "section 5" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 7 and 9."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, strike out lines 5 and 14, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The board, after publicly declaring its findings, shall arrange to secure the cost of production for that portion of the commodity sold in the domestic market, by means of such plan or plans hereinafter authorized in Titles I, II, and III as in the opinion of the board will be most effective for such purpose; and such plan or plans shall continue in operation until such time as the board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy declared by section 1.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if I understand the proposition it means that the board will undertake to apply Title I or Title II or Title III, which means the equalization plan or the debenture plan or the allotment plan, as it may see fit in each circumstance, with any given commodity.

Mr. HOWELL. In accordance with the general provisions beginning in section 1 of the bill. This grants no greater power. It simply indicates what they are to do.

Mr. MOSES. I understand that, but it might result, having three commodities, that the plan of Title I would be applied to the first commodity, the plan of Title II would be applied to the second commodity, and the plan of Title III would be applied to the third commodity. In other words, I can see very little or no uniformity in the purpose. If the bill is a general shotgun proposition, shooting into the flock hoping to bring down something, I do not see why we should particularize as here proposed that they may apply Title I, Title II, or Title III. In other words, it seems to me that it is a generalization.

Mr. McNARY rose.

Mr. MOSES. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Oregon if he could be more lucid about it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not conversant with the amendment read, but from its reading I do not see where it particularly differs from the plan already contained in the text of section 4.

Mr. MOSES. Nor do I; and while it is offered supposedly for clarification, it seems to me it goes much further than mere clarification of language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MOSES. Just a minute, Mr. President. I do not intend to be deprived of the information I am seeking if that information is available. If it is not available, of course, I shall have to submit and vote against the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may express the hope that the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his amendment. I think it is no improvement over the text. Indeed, I think it is more ambiguous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the chair to understand that the Senator from Nebraska withdraws his amendment?

Mr. HOWELL. This is the bill of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], and certainly I am not going to insist upon the amendment. It was an amendment prepared by the Legislative Bureau of the Senate to clarify the meaning so there could not be a mistake. I have no objection to withdrawing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to say for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire that, as I understand it, the idea of the three plans is to give the board a chance to use any one of the plans or any combination of them on any farm product. They might find that the debenture would apply better to one commodity and that the equalization fee would apply better to another commodity and the allotment plan to some other commodity.

Mr. MOSES. The proposed expansion of power of the Farm Board being based, I assume, upon the remarkable success which the board have already had with more limited power.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Farm Board have made more of a success than the Senator from New Hampshire and some others would give them credit for having made.

Mr. MOSES. I give them perfect credit for anything they have done, but have they done anything except lose several hundred millions of public money?

Mr. FRAZIER. The loss of the public money depends upon the price of the commodities which they have purchased in order to stabilize or in their attempts to stabilize the market. The price of wheat in Chicago has been consistently above the world price in Liverpool in the last six months, something that was never known before. The Farm Board are undoubtedly responsible for that fact.

Mr. MOSES. Of course, I hold an entirely different view. I hold that the higher price of wheat in the Chicago market was due to the American tariff on wheat.

Mr. FRAZIER. It is not 42 cents higher by any means, so the tariff is not all effective, at least, and we have had the tariff for some time. Since we have had the tariff the price of wheat in Winnipeg has been higher than it has been in Minneapolis, but it is not that way this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska having withdrawn his amendment, the clerk will report the next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, the Senator from Nebraska proposes to strike out lines 16 to 19, inclusive, which read as follows:

SEC. 12. (a) A marketing agreement with cooperative associations engaged in handling the commodity or corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations shall provide either—

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 12. The board is authorized and directed to enter into marketing agreements with cooperative associations engaged in handling any commodity as to which the plan set forth in this title is in effect or with corporations created and controlled by one or more cooperative associations. Each such agreement shall provide either—

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, does that mean that they have to make the plan effective for any commodity before they can enter into this agreement, or do they carry on simultaneous negotiations, or just how do they function under the new provision?

Mr. HOWELL. They function just as was intended in the bill. They can choose either of the three plans for operating on a particular commodity. That is the intent of the bill.

Mr. MOSES. But that is not what the four lines proposed to be stricken out provide. It is, of course, what the four lines intended to be added say; that is to say, the lines which are proposed to be added say that when they have made effective this plan under Title I then they may go ahead.

Mr. HOWELL. The purpose is to give the board direct authority for entering into the market agreements set forth. If we want to make the bill effective, this does not change the intent of the bill, but simply makes it effective.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not like to find myself in disagreement with the very laudable purposes of the Senator from Nebraska; but this section as now in the bill was the one originally in the bill as it first passed the Senate and as it passed the Senate upon a second occasion. It merely points out that the board must act through cooperative associations. That was the intent of the bill, and it ought to be the purpose now to conform to the purposes of the marketing act passed in 1929, namely, that the cooperative organizations and associations shall make these marketing contracts. I think really it would be a mistake to change that language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Oregon, I withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(b)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. MOSES. Just a moment, Mr. President; my attention was diverted. May that amendment be stated again?

The amendment was again stated.

Mr. MOSES. That seems to be innocuous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(a)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 16, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(b)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, these alphabetical corrections seem to me to be of little consequence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(c)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the letter "(d)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 21, after the word "cent" it is proposed to insert the closed parenthesis, and to strike out the closed parenthesis after the word "obligation" in the same line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, it is proposed to strike out lines 17 to 25, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) As used in this title the term "debenturable commodity" means any agricultural commodity as to which the board has made this title operative as authorized in section 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MOSES. Just a moment, Mr. President. Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska does that change cover the criticisms of the bill which I attempted to make a short time ago with reference to the limited commodities on which the bill will operate?

Mr. HOWELL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator may remember that I referred to the limited number of commodities on which this bill will operate. I referred to some farm products of New England, which are of considerable importance to that locality. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will state whether the amendment he has just proposed is in such form as would take in those staples which the East produces, because corn, rice, wheat, cotton, and tobacco are not raised in any considerable quantities east of the Hudson River or north of the Ohio.

Mr. HOWELL. This bill covers all agricultural commodities. When a substantial number of producers of a commodity appeal to the board, the board is authorized to proceed to stabilize the price of such commodity. The matter proposed to be stricken out, on page 12, fails to recognize that the debenture plan may not be put into effect. The purpose of the new matter is to define "debenturable commodities" to mean only those commodities as to which the debenture plan is in effect.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I do not think it means anything to say that the debenture applies to those commodities which the debenture affects; in other words, the debenture applies to those commodities to which the debenture applies. I do not see any essential difference in the language than that which I have used, and I beg the Senator to tell me whether this is intended to broaden the field of operation of the debenture so that it will take in all staple commodities.

Mr. HOWELL. The only purpose of this amendment is to clarify the text, to make clear what is intended.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think without doubt this amendment will broaden the language of the bill. Of course, the debenture will not apply to anything that is not exportable, but the amendment would make it broad enough to take in all exportable products.

Mr. MOSES. Would it make it broad enough to take hay and apples?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; if they are exported.

Mr. MOSES. They are exportable, are they not?

Mr. FRAZIER. They might be exportable, but not exported.

Mr. MOSES. I understand that, being exportable, the debenture will apply to them, will it not?

Mr. FRAZIER. If they are exported; yes.

Mr. MOSES. What I am trying to get at is whether the section of the country from which I come is to be totally excluded from these three different proposals which are set up for the benefit supposedly of agriculture. What agriculture? The agriculture of the West or the agriculture of the whole country? The agriculture of those sections which raise corn and rice and wheat and cotton and tobacco or the agriculture of those sections of the country which raise diversified crops?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MOSES. Very well, having lost the floor, the Senator from Texas can not ask me to yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I might reply to the Senator who complains as to his section not receiving any benefit, that if it is not subject to the other plans, it will get the benefit of the third plan.

Mr. MOSES. The allotment plan?

Mr. CONNALLY. The allotment plan.

Mr. MOSES. I hope before we finish with that plan the Senator from Texas will explain it to me in words of one syllable.

Mr. CONNALLY. I can not do that.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the little State in New England from which he comes is not the only State in the Union where hay and apples are raised.

Mr. MOSES. Very well. I want to say then——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. MOSES. I want to say that for weeks, almost daily I have listened to the Cato from the Middle West, who has declared that "agriculture must not be destroyed" and that the farmer must be helped, and I have been trying to find out who that farmer is. I should like to know whether he is one of the 15,000 farmers of the State of New Hampshire, who with his ancestors for 300 years has literally wrested a living from a reluctant soil, a soil that had to be reclaimed in the first instance from the forest, a farmer who has diversified his crops, who has paid no attention to the Liverpool market, who has looked to the market wherein he might have an entrance, whose scanty acres number scarcely more than 100 to a farm, and who through diversification of his crops and through hard work has been able to shelter, to clothe, to feed and educate his children, and even to save money; Mr. President, he being of that class of farmers in that State who have money in the savings banks to the extent of $600 per capita, which money has been loaned in other sections of the country to his improvident brethren in agriculture. Is he the farmer of whom we are thinking, or are we thinking alone of the 1-crop farmer who spends 30 days in the year putting his crop into the soil and then lets nature take care of it until the fall, when he spends 30 days taking it out, who, if nature has been kind and if prices are high, is prosperous and spends his winters in Florida or southern California, and if nature is unkind and prices are low, he goes broke and spends his winters in Washington yammering at the gates of the Treasury for help. Who is the farmer we are trying to help, Mr. President? When we speak about this section of this bill and enumerate the commodities which are here listed, I want to know whether this bill is designed for the farmers of one section of the country or two sections of the country in sections where the particular commodities are grown, or whether it is designed for the farmers everywhere who may diversify their crops and still have something for export.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska, as read by the clerk, it appears to me enlarges the scope of the language included in the bill. It refers to section 11, which refers to all agricultural commodities and, in paragraph (b), specifies that the board must make certain findings, namely, that there is a surplus production in excess of the domestic requirements; second, that loans to cooperatives will not be effective to control the excess production; third, that the marketing act as now constituted does not afford a remedy; and fourth, that it lends itself by processing to the operation of the three different plans.

When that finding is made, it refers to any agricultural commodity wheresoever produced. That was meant to be, and I think is, the intention of the amendment, and I believe it meets the criticism suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Oregon says, I think I am entitled to congratulate myself upon having found something in an agricultural relief bill which is good for the farmers of my section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from the Miami County (Kans.) Farmers' Union signed by W. J. Prescott, president, which I want to read to the Senate. The telegram is as follows:

OSAWATOMIE, KANS., June 13, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington:

The Miami County Farmers' Union request you use your influence, vote, and labor to keep Congress in session until some definite relief accomplished for agriculture. We refer to the McNary bill, sponsored by three major farm organizations. We request you to inform other Members of our desire.

THE MIAMI COUNTY FARMERS' UNION,
By W. J. PRESCOTT, President.

Mr. President, I desire most earnestly to second the appeal of the Miami County Farmers' Union. The business of this Congress is to take definite action for the relief of agriculture. It is not the duty of Congress to run away from this issue.

There can be no permanent prosperity, there can be no relief from this depression, unless and until there is a rise in the prices of farm products, which, in my judgment, would be accompanied by rises in prices for other basic commodities. Without these better prices the country is without purchasing power.

This Congress has been in session for 6½ months. To-day is the first time the Senate has considered any general measure for the direct relief of agriculture. I grant that the constructive measures the Congress has enacted were necessary to sustain the financial fabric of the country, but the relief they have given agriculture has been indirect and so far of very doubtful value.

I am under no illusions that the McNary bill will cure the agricultural situation. But it is a step in the right direction. I for one will oppose any adjournment until this Congress has taken decisive action at least on this measure. And I intend to support the McNary bill, because I have hopes it will help alleviate the situation.

To go home without making any attempt to relieve agriculture, beyond the indirect relief so far offered in measures primarily intended for other purposes, will be a plain breach of trust, as I see the situation.

Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD at this point a communication addressed to the Congress by the representatives of the National Grange, the Farmers' Union, and the American Farm Bureau Federation regarding the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The communication referred to is as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION,
THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION.

To the Congress:

A vote on S. 4536, by Senator McNARY, and H. R. 11866, by Congressman FULMER, has been promised representatives of the national farm organizations by leaders of both political parties before adjournment. This bill amends the agricultural marketing act to secure cost of production for the portions of farm products consumed in the domestic markets by using the equalization fee, the debenture, or the allotment plan, or combinations thereof. This measure does not require additional appropriations to make it effective. It gives the Federal Farm Board the option of using any one of the three plans named above, but requires the board to keep the cost of producing farm crops in mind as the goal to be attained relative to prices.

It is now recognized by the farm organizations that no one plan of surplus control can be effective under all conditions which might develop. Accordingly different methods should be supplied the administrative authorities so that every possible chance will be given to grapple with and control the surplus of any commodity at any time.

It is not unusual for Congress to give alternative plans of operation for use in administering important laws which have been enacted, so, in the present instance, if in controlling and disposing of surpluses any one of three plans or combination thereof, is available for use the certainty of adequately disposing of the surplus is increased.

The equalization-fee plan gets its fund with which to operate upon the surplus from the commodities themselves; the debenture plan issues debenture certificates to exporters of farm commodities in the amounts designated in this measure, or ordinarily half the tariff rates in effect; the allotment plan segregates a product into two parts; first, that to be consumed in the domestic market; and second, that to go abroad.

The plans are very similar in many regards, a few of which are:

(a) They operate automatically to control, regulate, and limit production;

(b) They do not require, or even permit, Federal authority giving a mandate to a farmer how much to produce or to sell, or the manner of his production and sale;

(c) They require no bookkeeping as between the Federal Government on the one hand and the individual farmer on the other;

(d) They are based on making the tariff effective for all farm crops;

(e) They recognize that there shall be a domestic price for the domestic consumption of farm crops and a foreign price for the exportable surplus;

(f) They give farm organizations more complete control over the marketing of farm products;

(g) They recognize cost of production as an indicator of what farm prices should be;

(h) They permit the sale of the complete crop raised by any farmer;

(i) They prevent importation into the United States of agricultural products, or substitutes therefor, the importation of which during a marketing period would destroy the effectiveness of the operation of either one or all of these plans.

Congress has not enacted any measure dealing fundamentally with the agricultural situation this session. It would surely be unwise for adjournment to be taken with no definite recognition given to the farm problem. This bill has the unqualified and unreserved support of the three national farm organizations.

Very respectfully,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
The National Grange.
JOHN A. SIMPSON,
The Farmers' Union.
EDW. A. O'NEAL,
The American Farm Bureau Federation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this price-fixing plan is similar to the price-fixing plan for goods and wares and materials? From time to time we have had bills in the Congress to fix the price of all articles of trade. Is this similar to such propositions as that? Does this apply to anything except agricultural products?

Mr. McNARY. That is all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It does not apply to anything except a few agricultural products?

Mr. McNARY. It is purely an agricultural bill. What the Senator has in mind probably is the allotment plan which as I stated this morning is sponsored by the Farmers' Union and may be described as a price-fixing plan.

Mr. TRAMMELL. For illustration, I am going to make reference to some agricultural products. In my State we produce anywhere from 25,000,000 to 35,000,000 boxes of oranges each year. A large crop would be 35,000,000 boxes and a small crop 25,000,000 boxes. Is there anything in this bill that will protect the orange growers of my State when the market does not give them the cost of production?

Mr. McNARY. If the allotment plan were applied and they were not receiving the cost of production a price could be fixed equal to the cost of production under the allotment plan.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then the consumer would have to pay the price so fixed.

Mr. McNARY. That is the theory of course, otherwise it would not be fixed.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The provisions of the bill would include crops of that character, would it?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. If the Senator will read Section 11 he will find the four conditions that must be found by the board, namely, if there is a surplus in excess of domestic requirements, if the farmer is not able to sell at the cost of production, and so forth.

Mr. TRAMMELL. What if there is not an excess, where is the justice requiring a class of farmers that are not producing an excess to have to sell below the cost of production and at the same time make a contribution toward paying other farmers the cost-of-production price?

Mr. McNARY. As I said this morning the purpose of these plans has been to solve the surplus-control problem, and this measure only deals with those agricultural commodities of which there is a surplus in excess of domestic requirements. It does not intend to fix the price of all commodities, but only in cases where a surplus is found to exist by the board.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then the munificence that is embraced in this measure is extended only to a certain class of farmers who have an overproduction or exportable production, as I understand.

I want to assist farmers in this country; but take the situation in States where the agricultural interest is engaged in production where there are no excesses to the extent of an exportable surplus: Does the Senator think it right to give such farmers no protection whatever, and require them probably to pay an increased price on account of the price-fixing provision of this bill? That is what it means.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator does not understand the purpose at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know what the purpose is. I understand that feature of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I am not quite sure about that.

The Senator has always supported loyally a reasonable tariff on commodities of an agricultural nature produced in foreign countries. Consequently, they are protected to that extent if there is not a surplus in this country. There is a balance between production and consumption. It is not attempted by this bill to fix the price of those commodities; but in the case of those commodities which are raised in excess of the domestic requirements, where the tariff is not effective, it is an attempt to get the surplus out of the country or control it so that the tariff will be effective, and increase the price level. The Senator's criticism goes to the point that it does not fix the price of all agricultural commodities that are below the cost of production, whether there is a surplus or not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is all right, if your remedy of tariff works successfully all the time; but if your remedy of tariff is an utter failure, and the farmers producing enormous crops do not get a price equal to the cost of production, then your remedy of tariff has failed utterly, and you leave that great class of the farmers of this country in the position of having to sell their products below the cost of production. I think you ought to try to protect them.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I think what the Senator from Oregon said is entirely correct respecting the debenture and equalization-fee provisions of the bill; but with respect to the allotment plan, if the Federal Farm Board make an investigation, they are authorized and directed to ascertain and make public the part of the domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption. That would seem to me to include the Senator's twenty-five or thirty-five million boxes of oranges. The allotment plan with respect to the first authorization of the board does not relate to exportable commodities.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator kindly call my attention to the paragraph to which he refers?

Mr. BLAINE. It is on page 18 of the bill, lines 2, 3, 4, and 5. That paragraph refers to any agricultural product.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I want to assist agriculture in any way possible, and I shall be glad to give that some study. All I want is justice to all agricultural interests. I do not feel that we ought to inaugurate a plan that will just be of assistance to a certain portion of those engaged in farming in the country, and so frame that assistance that it will create a greater burden on another certain part and a large class of the agricultural interests of the country. I do not like that kind of a measure.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will suffer another interruption, if the Federal Farm Board applies the allotment plan it seems clear to me that it then is authorized and directed to ascertain and make public the part of the domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption. Then such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity, as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced. That refers to any agricultural product, whether there is an exportable surplus or not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Well, I do not know. It says that they shall ascertain the part of it required for domestic consumption.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That of itself carries with it the idea that as to that portion of it that is required for domestic consumption, you may enter into this price-fixing plan; but you have to have sufficient to have an exportable surplus, do you not?

Mr. BLAINE. I think the language clearly indicates that the Federal Farm Board have the power to ascertain and find the cost of production of any farm commodity, whether there is an exportable surplus or not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This paragraph, though, certainly contemplates an exportable quantity, because after it goes on to speak about ascertaining the cost of the portion needed for domestic consumption, in line 9, the latter part of the line, it says:

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported.

Mr. BLAINE. If there is any surplus. That is another provision. That has to do with the exportable surplus; but the first two paragraphs of the section clearly authorize the Federal Farm Board to ascertain the cost of production of any farm commodity.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does the Senator think this is essential in addition to the debenture plan?

Mr. BLAINE. The Federal Farm Board may apply this particular allotment plan to some specific commodity.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have supported the debenture plan on two or three occasions, but I am rather doubtful as to the wisdom of a price-fixing plan.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understood, the Senator from Florida said that he only desired that justice should be done to the farmer. I desire to ask him to prepare an amendment that will provide that justice shall roll down like the waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream, and then have that substituted for the whole bill. I think it will do about as much good as the bill will do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am in sympathy with those sentiments, but I think the Senator from Kentucky is more capable of preparing an amendment of that character than myself.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. What is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment has not been stated, because the clerk has not had an opportunity to state it.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The issuance of export debentures with respect to any such commodity shall continue during such period as the board may specify.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MOSES. Just a minute, Mr. President. Do we strike out paragraph (b) on page 12, and insert nothing in place of it?

Mr. HOWELL. No, Mr. President.

Mr. MOSES. Well, that is the way the amendment was stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, the committee proposed to strike out lines 17 to 25, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) As used in this title, the term "debentural commodity" means any agricultural commodity as to which the board has made this title operative as authorized in section 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was agreed to, may the Chair state for the information of the Senator.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is on page 13, to strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The issuance of export debentures with respect to any such commodity shall continue during such period as the board may specify.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment just agreed to stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment will be reconsidered, and the clerk will state the amendment for the information of the Senator from Georgia.

The legislative clerk restated the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask if the purpose of that is to put the debenture in operation wholly at the discretion of the board?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is as follows: The matter stricken out provides that the issuance of the export debentures shall commence on July 1, 1932. Since the debenture plan may not be put into effect immediately or at all, it is necessary to restate this paragraph; and so it is restated in this way:

The issuance of export debentures with respect to any such commodity shall continue during such period as the board may specify.

Mr. GEORGE. That is, any commodity—all commodities?

Mr. HOWELL. Any commodity that the board may specify.

Mr. GEORGE. I am trying to understand it. As I understand it, if I do, the debenture plan as first inserted in the bill was made obligatory or mandatory as to certain commodities; but now, as I understand it, the whole matter is left in the discretion of the board. That is to say, the board may put the debenture plan in operation or may withhold it.

Mr. McNARY. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the purpose?

Mr. McNARY. Unquestionably. In section 11, the first section of the bill, the board is required to make four specific findings; and after they are made, and the board determines that those conditions exist, then the board shall put it into effect. This language indicates that they must; it is mandatory to put it into effect on July 1, 1932, whether it is feasible or not, or whether the conditions prescribed in section 11 obtain.

Mr. GEORGE. I probably have misunderstood it; but I assumed that as to corn, rice, wheat, cotton, and tobacco the debenture applies without any discretion upon the part of the Farm Board, because the Secretary of the Treasury himself was required to issue the debentures; but with respect to all other commodities the Farm Board had first to find certain facts. By amendment, however, I have the impression that all commodities are now considered in the same class.

Mr. McNARY. Unquestionably. The term "agricultural commodities" is used in the generic sense; and the board can invoke any of these plans provided they find four conditions existing among the producers:

First. There must be a surplus.

Second. The cost of production must exceed the price for which the product can be sold.

Third. That the present marketing act does not permit them to handle the situation.

Fourth. That the product lends itself to operation under this bill.

So that it applies to any agricultural commodity; but the board can not invoke the provisions of this bill until these findings are made, and they might never be made.

That answers the Senator's question; does it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps I understand it somewhat better, but as I did understand it, I thought that these particular commodities, corn, rice, wheat, cotton, and tobacco, were declared to be debenturable commodities.

Mr. McNARY. That is true, but the objection was made that it was not sufficiently general to take in any agricultural commodities. As originally introduced, it was limited to wheat, corn, rice, and cotton, but producers of other commodities found themselves suffering from the distress of a surplus and decided they wanted to come under the benefit of the act, so it applies generally to all agricultural commodities.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I understand it, but let me ask this one additional question. If the four findings indicated on pages 1, 2, and 3, down to Title I of the bill are made by the board, it will still be necessary for the board to declare that a particular commodity is a debenturable commodity and to put the debenture plan into operation as to that commodity.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. And that is true whether it be corn or potatoes, for instance?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, at this point I think there should be printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter which has been received by Members of Congress. It is a letter explaining this bill and, of course, the three individual parts of the bill, the debenture proposal, the equalization-fee plan, and the allotment plan. I submit this letter for the RECORD.

Mr. MOSES. Who is the author, may I ask?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The letter is signed by Fred Brenckman, of the National Grange; John A. Simpson, of the Farmers' Union; and Edward A. O'Neal, of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE—THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION—THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

To the Congress:

A vote on S. 4536, by Senator McNARY, and H. R. 11866, by Congressman FULMER, has been promised representatives of the national farm organizations by leaders of both political parties before adjournment. This bill amends the agricultural marketing act to secure cost of production for the portions of farm products consumed in the domestic markets by using the equalization fee, the debenture, or the allotment plan, or combinations thereof. This measure does not require additional appropriations to make it effective. It gives the Federal Farm Board the option of using any one of the three plans named above, but requires the board to keep the cost of producing farm crops in mind as the goal to be attained relative to prices.

It is now recognized by the farm organizations that no one plan of surplus control can be effective under all conditions which might develop. Accordingly different methods should be supplied the administrative authorities so that every possible chance will be given to grapple with and control the surplus of any commodity at any time.

It is not unusual for Congress to give alternative plans of operation for use in administering important laws which have been enacted, so, in the present instance, if in controlling and disposing of surpluses any one of three plans, or combination thereof, is available for use the certainty of adequately disposing of the surplus is increased.

The equalization-fee plan gets its fund with which to operate upon the surplus from the commodities themselves; the debenture plan issues debenture certificates to exporters of farm commodities in the amounts designated in this measure, or ordinarily half the tariff rates in effect; the allotment plan segregates a product into two parts—first, that to be consumed in the domestic market; and second, that to go abroad.

The plans are very similar in many regards, a few of which are:

(a) They operate automatically to control, regulate, and limit production;

(b) They do not require, or even permit, Federal authority giving a mandate to a farmer how much to produce or to sell, or the manner of his production and sale;

(c) They require no bookkeeping as between the Federal Government on the one hand and the individual farmer on the other;

(d) They are based on making the tariff effective for all farm crops;

(e) They recognize that there shall be a domestic price for the domestic consumption of farm crops and a foreign price for the exportable surplus;

(f) They give farm organizations more complete control over the marketing of farm products;

(g) They recognize cost of production as an indicator of what farm prices should be;

(h) They permit the sale of the complete crop raised by any farmer;

(i) They prevent importation into the United States of agricultural products, or substitutes therefor, the importation of which during a marketing period would destroy the effectiveness of the operation of either one or all of these plans.

Congress has not enacted any measure dealing fundamentally with the agricultural situation this session. It would surely be unwise for adjournment to be taken with no definite recognition given to the farm problem. This bill has the unqualified and unreserved support of the three national farm organizations.

Very respectfully,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
The National Grange.
JOHN A. SIMPSON,
The Farmers Union.
EDW. A. O'NEIL,
The American Farm Bureau Federation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I call the attention of Members of the Senate on the other side of the aisle to a news article appearing in to-night's paper. It is as follows:

DRIVE FOR FARM-AID DECLARATION OPENED—PLANK CONTAINING MARKET ACT O. K.—EQUALIZATION FEE AND TARIFF PARITY FORECAST

CHICAGO, June 13.—American agriculture's advance guard at the scene of the Republican National Convention is striving to meet the party platform committee with a united front on farm relief.

The farm groups, variously urging the equalization fee, the debenture plan, and the allotment plan, were spurred on toward unity by realization of the possibility the prohibition issue will take so much of the attention of the platform makers that the appeal of agriculture must be made brief, pointed, and effective.

No farmers' demonstrations were planned.

It seemed certain to platform architects that the farm-relief plank of the party would contain three points: A general indorsement of the agricultural marketing act policy which will admit of amendments to meet present conditions, a stand favoring equalization of taxation to reduce the farmer's burden, and a pledge to extend to farm products tariff protection on a parity with that given manufactured products.

Mr. President, if this news item has the foundation which I always accord to the Associated Press dispatches, I am justified in the conclusion that representatives of the three farm organizations are now in Chicago making a demand of the platform writers at the Republican convention that the Republican platform declare in favor of the identical bill now pending. What the platform committee will do, of course, I can not foretell.

I will also say that when the Democratic convention meets the same representatives of the farm organizations will be at that convention with a similar demand, and while no one can tell, I prophesy that each of the platforms will declare in favor of the enactment of a bill identical in principle with the bill now pending before the Senate. There is no other plan proposed, there is no other bill pending, and no self-assumed or admitted statesman has any plan for the benefit of agriculture other than the plan and bill sponsored by the three national farm organizations. In the absence of any plan from those to whom they have looked for years for aid, it occurs to me that the least Congress can do is to give these three farm organizations their remedy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am afraid the able Senator from Oklahoma has forgotten that we had farm relief. When Congress was called into special session after Mr. Hoover's election, he submitted to us his plan, namely, the formation of the Farm Board. It was to accomplish miracles. Those of us who have had the temerity to criticize it have been remonstrated with, and it has been said that it will accomplish and will continue to accomplish great good and alleviate the sorrows and the burdens and the sufferings of the farmers. I am afraid that my distinguished friend fails to appreciate the great and glorious measure, which through the genius and statesmanship of Mr. Hoover has been crystallized into law and placed on the statute books.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I appreciate the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I now propound to him the following inquiry: What plan has the distinguished Senator from Utah for the relief of the farmer?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not profess to be an expert on farm relief; I understand my friend from Oklahoma does, and I ask him what plan he has to submit for farm relief, other than this medley before us, this composite, three-headed provision which we have before us?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am free to say that if I had my way, I would pump into the circulation of the country a very large increase of money, on the theory that more money makes cheaper money, and as money comes down, commodity prices go up.

All admit that there is no possible relief for the country until commodity prices are increased; and it is my conviction that unless something can be done to accomplish that result, through the coinage of silver, or through a new discovery of gold, or through a liberal increase of paper money in circulation, probably no other relief will be possible.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator may have observed in the papers this morning that the very able Secretary of the Treasury, Ogden Mills, has gone to Chicago to lead the advance guard in favor of Mr. Hoover, and that it is reported that they have declared that nothing shall be said looking to what they denominate "inflation," that we are to affirm our faith in the gold standard as the only remedy by which we may be extricated from our dilemma, and that nothing is to be said about silver, its remonetization, its use for primary basic purposes, or any increase whatever in the metallic basis upon which the currencies and credits of the country are to rest.

So, I think my friend, if he looks to the Republican Party as being for a platform declaration in favor of a liberalization of the fiscal policy, will be doomed to disappointment; but knowing that he does not accept anything at the hands of the Republican Party, I am sure that he will look with anticipation on something being done at the Democratic convention.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am free to say that I am not following Mr. Mills, because his statements are so universally synonymous with error and mistake that I could not follow him anywhere.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. It has interested me very greatly to have these Democratic authorities telling what is going to be in the Republican platform.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I admit that it will not make much difference what is in the Republican platform.

Mr. MOSES. Possibly to-morrow I may take advantage of the situation to air my views as to what is going to be in the Democratic platform. I can assure the Senator that I can speak with quite as much authority as any of these distinguished Democrats who are telling what will be in the Republican platform.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is such a good prognosticator that I would be glad to yield to him now to tell us what will be in the Democratic platform.

Mr. MOSES. I should have to reflect on that subject, and undoubtedly sleep on it, before I could deal adequately with it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has been quizzing Senators who have objected to this bill with reference to their farm programs. I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he has any assurance whatever that the present administration will now approve either the equalization-fee principle or the debenture plan, and in that connection I want to remind him that the two main features of this bill have been on at least one or two occasions vetoed by a Republican president, and I have understood that it was on the advice of the present President, who was then Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if the Republican convention at Chicago should declare in its platform in favor of this identical bill, and if the present Chief Executive is renominated and chooses to stand on that platform, I am constrained to believe that in the event Congress sent him this bill, he would approve it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator has offered the farmers of this country very little hope of any farm legislation, when he must know that Republican administrations have repeatedly disapproved the equalization-fee principle and the debenture plan, both of which are included in this bill. I dare say that the Senator from Oklahoma himself could not warmly and enthusiastically indorse the allotment plan as it is worked out in this bill, to say the least of it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The allotment plan in this bill simply sets forth a principle—that the farmers are entitled to the cost of production. Is the Senator from Georgia against that principle?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly not.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There is no other bill, so far as I know, that has been brought before the Congress, or will be brought before the Congress, for the relief of agriculture, and in the absence of the Congress having a plan for the benefit of the farmer, why not accept the bill proposed by the farm organizations and give it a trial? It can be no worse than the failures heretofore made by the Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think one of the chief troubles of agriculture is that it has been given a lot of unsound legislation on trial, and here we are proposing something for the relief of agriculture which has been repeatedly disapproved by Republican administrations, and there has been no change of heart, so far as I know, upon the part of the present President with regard to the equalization-fee principle or the export-debenture plan.

I heartily agree that the farmer ought to have cost of production, and he ought to have profit beyond that; but I can see no good on earth in merely repeating some perfectly unobjectionable declaration of that sort when there is nothing offered in this bill which would possibly get by the President which would give the farmer a chance to enjoy the cost of production, much less any profit upon his product. In this bill the promise is meaningless.

I want to say to the Senator that I do not think the farmer will get relief unless we have the courage to say that we are through with impossible and useless nostrums. If we are not going to do more than repeat fiction about putting agriculture on an equality with industry, and about giving the farmer cost of production, first, plus a profit, if that is the extent of our capacity to serve him, then agriculture is not going to improve.

The President called the Congress in extraordinary session and offered the farm marketing act and revision of the tariff. The tariff did nothing but accentuate and aggravate the difficulties under which the farmer was then living. It has improved his condition not one whit. The farm marketing act I dare say has been of little benefit to the farmer. I do not say it has been of no benefit, but it has been of very little benefit to the farmer.

The equalization-fee principle, the debenture plan, and the allotment principle as written in this bill present a tariff proposal affecting the revenue, originating in the Senate—a waste of time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 7 o'clock having arrived, the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into becomes effective.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask what was the last amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the next amendment on the farm bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the last amendment was agreed to and there is no amendment pending.

Mr. MOSES. In other words, all the committee amendments have been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are other amendments that have not yet been offered. They are on the table. The committee amendments have all been agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my recollection is that the amendment offered on page 13 was not agreed to. Pending the consideration of it a colloquy ensued between a number of Senators and there was no agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that it was agreed to, but the RECORD will show the fact.

Mr. MOSES. It was my understanding that the amendment on page 13 had not been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair was not here when the amendment was being considered. He was advised by the clerks that it had been agreed to.

Mr. KING. I had intended to make inquiry in regard to subsection (a) and what implications were to follow from the language, and I was waiting an opportunity to interrogate the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. If the Senate agreed to the amendment it was, I think, without some of us knowing it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask unanimous consent that in the morning when we take up the unfinished business we shall revert to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon if it is his purpose to take up this bill to-morrow? I understood that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] intended to call up the banking bill for consideration.

Mr. McNARY. In answer to the Senator from Utah I will state that it is my purpose to proceed with the farm bill so long as it is the unfinished business. I know nothing about what is in the mind of the Senator from Virginia.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, pursuant to law, lists of useless papers in the files of the Navy Department which are no longer needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HALE and Mr. TRAMMELL members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the Philippine independence bill which, under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, was to be taken up at this hour.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7233) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as we have reached the hour of the special order, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Davis	Kean	Reed
Bankhead	Dill	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Frazier	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bratton	George	Lewis	Schall
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Logan	Sheppard
Broussard	Gore	McKellar	Shortridge
Bulow	Hale	McNary	Steiwer
Byrnes	Harrison	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Hastings	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Cohen	Hawes	Neely	Townsend
Connally	Hayden	Norbeck	Trammell
Copeland	Howell	Nye	Vandenberg
Costigan	Hull	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Cutting	Johnson	Patterson	Watson
Dale	Jones	Pittman	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, owing to the lateness of the hour and the parliamentary situation, I intend to take very little time in making a preliminary statement with reference to the bill. The bill, however, is of sufficient importance to deserve a brief outline of the principles which actuated the committee and of the results which the committee achieved.

The first section to which I desire to call attention is the last section of the bill, section 13, under which the act does not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for the purpose of passing upon that question as may be provided by the Philippine Legislature. In other words, the first action under the bill is an action which must be taken by the Philippine legislature. Until they ratify by their act the bill passed by Congress, no further step will be taken.

The next action in point of time is that defined in sections 1 to 4 of the bill under which the Philippine Legislature is to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, which shall draft a constitution.

Section 2 contains various mandatory provisions which that constitution must include. Under section 3 the President of the United States must determine whether or not the constitution adopted conforms with the provisions of section 2.

Section 4 provides that, after the President of the United States has certified that the constitution conforms with the provisions of this bill, it is to be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held within four months after the date of such certification.

Sections 5 and 6 deal with the transfer of property and rights to the Philippine Commonwealth and with the relations of that Commonwealth with the United States pending complete independence.

Under section 6, which is the section dealing with trade limitations and tariffs, it is provided that during the first 10 years the free importation of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits. This deals in particular with sugar, with coconut oil, and with cordage. The period of probation is to last 15 years. During the first 10 years this system of limitation is to be enforced. After the tenth year a graduated tariff is provided. During the eleventh year it will be 5 per cent, during the twelfth year 10 per cent, during the thirteenth year 15 per cent, during the fourteenth year 20 per cent, and thereafter 25 per cent of the rates on commodities which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

I use the word "tariff" merely in a rough sense. Actually this is not a tariff but an export tax. The proceeds of the tax are to be placed in a sinking fund for the benefit of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and applied to the payment of the principal and the interest of the bonded indebtedness of the islands. It has been figured that if the inhabitants of the Philippines should at the end of the period decide for independence their bonded indebtedness would have been entirely wiped out and that they would start on their independent career probably more stable economically than any other government in existence.

It is provided in section 8 that pending independence Philippine immigration to the United States shall be limited to a minimum annual quota of 100.

Section 7 deals with the relations between the United States Government, which is to be represented by a high commissioner, and the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

I am not going into detail as to any of these provisions, because they will undoubtedly require discussion as the individual sections come up, and there will probably be amendments presented to some of them. I am merely trying to outline the main features of the measure.

Section 9 is the section which is the basis of this whole bill. It provides that at any time after the expiration of the fifteenth year and before the expiration of the seventeenth year the people of the Philippines shall take a vote on the question of Philippine independence. If a majority favor independence, they will automatically attain the status of a foreign nation. There are certain provisos with which at the moment I shall not trouble the Senate. If, on the other hand, a majority of the votes cast are against Philippine independence, the chief executive of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to Congress for their action, but, unless Congress otherwise provides, the Philippine Islands shall revert to the status established by this act for the first 10 years after the inauguration of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands; that is to say, they will revert to the status of limitation on certain articles of export.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico permit an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Assuming that the Filipinos do not vote in favor of independence, will the status of the government as provided for in this bill change at the time of the expiration of that period; that is to say, will they maintain the government which is contemplated shall be set up under the name of a Philippine Commonwealth?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; unless Congress shall otherwise provide.

Mr. KING. Then, of course, it would be in the power of Congress to supersede any legislation and to give to them such form of government as it desired?

Mr. CUTTING. I think that is absolutely true.

Mr. President, this bill is the product of a good deal of work on the part of a good many Members of this body. It represents a certain definite theory. I do not, of course, mean by that that the Senate must take it or leave it as a whole; there are many details in it which, of course, the Senate may in its wisdom see fit to change; but the bill does rest on one consistent theory. It should not be modified, for instance, merely by changing the number of years involved in the different brackets. If the Senate desires to give the Philippines immediate independence, it should adopt the substitute plan provided by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If, on the other hand, the Senate prefers the carefully thought out plan of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], it should adopt it as a whole, with such incidental modifications in detail as may seem wise.

With the exception of those two Senators, the committee was pretty much of one mind as to the kind of bill which it desired to report; and while, like most pieces of legislation, the pending measure represents a compromise to some extent between different schools of thought, it is a compromise which seemed to a well-nigh unanimous committee the best way of meeting the difficulties which it had to face.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico suffer a further interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. KING. While I have no right to inquire as to the reasons which prompt Senators to modify views formerly expressed, either orally or in writing, I was wondering what basic reasons there were for changing this bill as it now comes from the committee from the form in which it was offered by the able Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Missouri which provided, as I recall, for a 5-year period of tutelage at the expiration of which time the Filipinos would have their independence?

Mr. CUTTING. I can say, for my own part, that at the time I introduced this measure, together with the able Senator from Missouri, I believed that five years would be long enough to meet the situation. After listening to evidence from a numerous body of witnesses who appeared before the committee I became convinced that in five years the trade relations between the two countries could not be modified to the satisfaction of either side. It will require a very great change in the economic system of the Philippines. I doubt very seriously whether such a change can be accomplished in less than 15 years.

This bill, as the Senator from Utah knows, provides, first, 10 years during which the Filipinos know that the change is going to be made. They can restrict their sugar crop, and some of their other industries, so as to fit themselves for the gradual raising of the tariff during the last five years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. May I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the fact that there is another restraint placed on the Filipinos during that first 10 years, and that is that any increase in other products over and above the quota that may come in now will have to find a market outside the United States or be subject to the tariff laws of the United States.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; that is quite true. I did not speak of that simply because I thought that question would come up when we discussed the trade limitation and tariff provisions.

Mr. President, I feel myself under a certain handicap in talking about this bill because, unlike so many other members of the committee, I have never had the privilege of visiting the Philippine Islands. I hope the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Nevada will go into the bill in more detail than I intend to do. What little I want to say this evening is something which seems to me to be based on the fundamental justice of the case rather than on any details; and I think in most of what I am going to say I shall probably find myself in agreement both with the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Michigan.

May I remind the Senate that in President McKinley's instructions to the first Philippine Commission on January 20, 1899, he expressed the hope that the commissioners would be received as bearers of the "blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation"?

In his message to Congress in the same year he said:

> The Philippines are ours, not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government.

Doctor Schurman, the president of the first Philippine Commission, at the said time said that the American policy meant "ever-increasing liberty and self-government."

And he added:

> It is the nature of such continuously expanding liberty to issue in independence.

Mr. Taft, as Secretary of War, in April, 1904, said:

> When they [the Filipinos] have learned the principles of successful popular self-government from a gradually enlarged experience therein, we can discuss the question whether independence is what they desire and grant it, or whether they prefer the retention of a closer association with the country which by its guidance has unselfishly led them on to better conditions.

In other words, as far back as 1904 the fundamental issue was whether the Filipino people should choose independence or choose to remain under the American flag.

In 1907 Mr. Taft said:

As the policy of extending control continues it must logically reduce and finally end the sovereignty of the United States in the islands, unless it shall seem wise to the American and the Filipino peoples, on account of mutually beneficial trade relations and possible advantages to the islands in their foreign relations, that the bond shall not be completely severed.

In 1908 President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress, stated:

I trust that within a generation the time will arrive when the Filipinos can decide for themselves whether it is well for them to become independent or to continue under the protection of a strong and disinterested power.

Again the choice was to be left to the people of the Philippines.

President Wilson on October 6, 1913, said:

We regard ourselves as trustees acting not for the advantage of the United States but for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands.

In 1916, as Members of the Senate are aware, the Congress of the United States took the first step toward carrying out these pledges. The Congress passed the so-called Jones law in February, 1916. I should like to read the preamble of that law:

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest of for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence—

Mark the next clause—

as soon as a stable government can be established herein; and

Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence.

So ends the preamble to the Jones law.

Now I want to say just a word about this phrase "as soon as a stable government can be established therein."

Many people who oppose Philippine independence say that the American promise referred to some rather vague period in the future, when the Filipinos might show "sufficient capacity," or "ability to govern themselves properly," or "ability to maintain their own economic independence." Those are not the phrases under which the preamble of the Jones Act pledged them their freedom. That preamble provides for "a stable government," and this phrase has a very definite meaning in American international law.

I shall not discuss the early cases when the South American Republics were recognized, or the meaning given to the phrase by President Jackson; but I should like to call to the attention of the Senate a message to Congress by President Grant in 1875 when he was asked to recognize the independence of the Cubans. In his message he said that he could not do so until the Cuban people had set up a government possessed of the elements of stability. He used these words:

Where a considerable body of people who have attempted to free themselves of the control of the superior government have reached such point in occupation of territory, in power, and in general organization as to constitute in fact a body politic, having a government in substance as well as in name, possessed of the elements of stability and equipped with the machinery for the administration of internal policy in the execution of its laws, prepared and able to administer justice at home as well as in its dealings with other powers, it is within the province of those other powers to recognize its existence as a new and independent nation.

And thereupon he went on to be more specific:

There must be a people occupying a known territory, united under some known and defined form of government, acknowledged by those subject thereto, in which the functions of government are administered by usual methods, competent to mete out justice to citizens and strangers, to afford remedies for public and for private wrongs, and able to assume the correlative international obligations and capable of performing the corresponding international duties resulting from its acquisition of the rights of sovereignty.

In his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, President McKinley made an even clearer statement of what the United States considered a stable government to be. He said:

I ask the Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations.

Those, according to President McKinley, are the two fundamental elements which constitute a stable government.

That doctrine has been followed almost without exception, not only by our own statesmen, but by those in foreign countries, and notably in recent years by the League of Nations in their decisions as to whether or not a particular country had already formed a stable government.

There is one limitation in our own history when Secretary Root, in defining what was meant by "a stable, orderly, and free government," with regard to the constitution of Cuba, said:

It is plain that the government to which we were thus to transfer our temporary obligations, should be a government based upon the peaceful suffrages of the people of Cuba, representing the entire people and holding their power from the people, and subject to the limitations and safeguards which the experience of constitutional government has shown to be necessary to the preservation of individual rights.

In other words, Secretary Root took the position that a stable government was not only a government capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, but also one based upon the peaceful suffrages of the people, and subject to the limitations which experience has shown to be necessary to the preservation of individual rights.

Whether those words of Secretary Root should be added to the usual definition of a stable government or not, the fact remains that the present government of the Philippine Islands carries out the provisions laid down in either doctrine.

According to the definition of the international legal experts of the League of Nations, a de facto government is one which has the support of the people. A further definition, under which Austria was declared to be a stable government, was that she had expressed her desire to observe her international obligations and had given proof of this by her conduct.

An extreme example of this sort of thing was the recognition of the stability of the Government of Albania at a time when her frontiers were not defined and when she was still occupied by foreign troops.

I think that has made it clear that "stable government" means:

First, ability to maintain order.

Second, ability to observe international obligations.

Even if we accept the additions made by Mr. Root in his instructions on the Cuban situation we meet a situation in which the Philippine government is obviously a stable one.

In 1919 Governor General Harrison accordingly reported that there was already in the Philippine Islands the stable government demanded by Congress, namely, "a government elected by the suffrages of the people, which is supported by the people, which is capable of maintaining order and of fulfilling its international obligations."

President Wilson, in his farewell message to Congress, officially certified that the Filipino people had already performed the condition imposed upon them as a prerequisite to independence. He said:

Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands. I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet.

I should also like to quote what the most distinguished antagonist of Mr. Wilson had to say at about the same time. Theodore Roosevelt said, in the same connection:

The islands should at an early moment be given their independence without any guaranty whatever by us and without our retaining any foothold in them.

A new doctrine has recently been elaborated by the Secretary of War. In a letter to Senator Bingham, chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, Secretary Hurley wrote this sentence:

An examination of the record leads to the conclusion that no commitment, legal or moral, exists as regards immediate independence, or independence within any specific period of years.

So far, I think probably most of us would agree with the Secretary; but he then goes on to say:

And no commitment as regards ultimate independence has been found which appears to be more binding that the correlative obligation for the continuation of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands until the trust which has been assumed in behalf of the Philippine people as a whole can honorably be terminated when they are adequately prepared to fully assume the responsibilities of complete independence.

In other words, according to this theory, the promise which we made that we would give them their independence when a certain definite date of history had been reached—namely, when they succeeded in establishing a stable government—is not of any greater importance than the duty which we, in our own conscience, feel that we should assume to stay there until we think that we ought to go.

I can not believe that the United States Senate will agree to any such doctrine.

It is a little difficult to know on just what grounds the Secretary of War maintains that theory.

In his testimony before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, he said:

Until the Filipino people shall have made greater progress toward economic independence, political independence would merely invite chaos and revolution. All the measures necessary for the attainment of economic independence can not be determined in advance.

In other words, apparently the "stable government" which was the condition of independence, includes economic stability—a thing which very few nations, if any, have attained.

On an objection made by Senator PITTMAN, the Secretary said:

I still contend that they have not shown, to me at least, a plan whereby the government of the Philippine Islands is to survive economically after independence.

On page 30 of the hearings, in a rather lengthy argument, he states that—

Consideration of economic factors alone demonstrates that the Philippine Islands are not yet prepared for independence.

On page 120 of the hearings, in reply to a question of mine as to the definiteness of our promise, the Secretary says:

We did promise the Philippine people ultimate independence.

I should like to read a few words from the testimony at this point:

Senator CUTTING. * * * Now, if you will pardon me for saying so, our obligation under the Jones Act was not to recognize their ultimate independence, but their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

Secretary HURLEY. Yes. Let me ask you a question. Do you believe that a stable government can exist, based on appointed representatives of the people instead of elected representatives?

Senator CUTTING. I will say this to you, Mr. Secretary: A stable government has been defined repeatedly in international law and over and over again by American precedents. It always means a government which can maintain law and order and can fulfill its international obligations. You do not include in the idea of a stable government the idea of economic stability, do you?

Senator KING. We are not very stable here in the United States right now economically.

Whereupon Secretary Hurley took the occasion to make some remarks about the present condition of the United States which I do not think it is necessary to read at the present time.

Senator CUTTING. Well, you would not go so far as to say that any country in the world to-day was economically independent, even our own?

Secretary HURLEY. Well, of course, I would not.

Later on, apparently throwing aside his own definition of a stable government as including economic stability, and further throwing aside the clear provisions laid down by President Grant and President McKinley, Secretary Hurley stated:

There is no question about the definition of a stable government. It is a government that can exist.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. In connection with Secretary Hurley's testimony, as the Senator has just stated, most of his objections were based upon a doubt as to the economic stability of the future government, rather than the political stability.

Mr. CUTTING. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was for that reason that the committee, in preparing this bill, went to a period further in the future for ultimate independence than some of us believed probably was advisable in the start, and, as the Senator has stated, under the plan of this bill, the export taxes which the Philippines will charge on their exports to the United States during the period of five years between the 10-year period and the 15-year period will place them, at the time of independence, without any debts whatever. Is not that true?

Mr. CUTTING. That is quite correct. May I say that I see no reason, even under the testimony of Secretary Hurley, why he should be opposed to the bill which is now before the Senate, because it seems to me to comply with the conditions which he laid down, as far as they were made clear to me, or to other members of the committee.

Mr. President, I intend to say nothing about the questions involving the interests of citizens of this country, although we had lengthy testimony by representatives of labor, by representatives of the farmer, and by representatives of various business interests, recommending the kind of a bill which should be passed. I say nothing about these questions because, important though they are, I think that the first note which must be struck in any discussion of Philippine independence is that we are bound as a nation to keep our pledges made to the Philippine people in the face of the world, and that that obligation is paramount to anything else which this bill contemplates.

I want to say further that, even if we had never made any promise to the Philippine people, I should still insist that it is illogical and improper for any government which professes to be based on the theory that all men are created equal to hold in subjection any people against their will. I take the ground which was taken by President McKinley and President Roosevelt and President Taft, that the question is for the Philippine people to decide, and for that reason I attach particular weight to the section of this bill dealing with the plebiscite. It seems to me that that is the fundamental section in this bill.

There, of course, is where I differ from my distinguished friend, the Senator from Utah. He believes that we owe the people of the Philippines immediate independence. I do not wish to speak for him, because I know that in due time he will make his position known in his usual forceful way. All I shall say now is this: That it seems to me that the promise we have made the Filipinos to give them independence at least implies that they themselves desire independence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, because of my necessary and regretted absence from the Senate during part of the discussion I am not advised concerning the entire argument. The able Senator has referred to the promise of the United States to give independence to the Philippine Islands. Has the Senator incorporated that promise in the RECORD?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I have done so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator is substantially accurate in attributing to me a desire for the immediate independence of the Filipinos. May I say, however, that the measure which I offered at the last session of Congress, and at the preceding session, and at this session, would have required perhaps two years or more for the necessary mechanics to have been complied with which would eventuate in independence.

Mr. CUTTING. I appreciate that, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I am tendering two or three brief amendments to the bill which I have heretofore offered, under the terms of which, if adopted, independence would not come for about 42 months, so that there would be a period of approximately four years in which the Filipinos could rearrange and readjust the economic and political conditions, and be ready, at the expiration of the period just indicated, to push out into the great international sea.

Mr. CUTTING. I understand that. In using the term "immediate" in reference to the Senator's bill, I used it merely in a relative way, as compared with the bill which is now before the Senate. I do not think that the time fixed by the Senator is sufficiently long, but that, of course, is a question on which the Senate will have to make up its own mind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from New Mexico has referred to the plebiscite. May I ask whether the pending bill defines the qualifications of electors who will be entitled to participate in that plebiscite?

Mr. CUTTING. It does not specifically define them, but I assume that they would be the same qualifications which are provided at present for electors in the islands, or which would be provided by the temporary constitution, which will be adopted almost immediately after this measure shall go into effect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no attempt in the bill to provide for supervision on the part of the United States of the election?

Mr. CUTTING. No. The Senator will understand that during the 15 preceding years the Philippines will practically be governing themselves, subject to certain provisos which are laid down, and which authorize the high commissioner to interfere if he chooses to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I take it that the details of the plebiscite will be determined by the Philippine legislative assembly?

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was about to observe that there are now a million and perhaps a hundred thousand qualified voters in the Philippine Islands. The qualifications are determined by the legislature. Women are denied the right of suffrage up to the present moment. As I read the bill, of which the Senator is one of the coauthors, it provides that the legislature shall determine the qualifications of electors and provide who shall vote. I presume they will continue the present qualifications, unless they shall elaborate them, and give the suffrage ultimately to women. That is for them to decide.

Mr. CUTTING. At any rate, there are no strings on them as far as this act is concerned.

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. CUTTING. I think I have said about all I care to say on this subject. I feel sure other details of the bill will be discussed ably by other Senators who have taken an active part in the drawing up of this legislation.

All I wish to say in conclusion is this, that to my mind everything else is secondary to the question of giving the Filipinos a chance to decide for themselves. I would not do anything to drive from under our flag any people who wanted to stay there. On the other hand, I do not believe in keeping under our flag any people who prefer to go it alone.

The period of time fixed in the bill will allow the Filipinos a chance to create a new economic system suitable for the new conditions under which they will have to exist after independence. After five years of experience I feel that they will be in a better position than they are now to decide whether or not independence is the course best adapted to their own national welfare.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the Senate has before it a very unusual collection of information on the subject of Philippine independence. In 1930 the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate, after long and tedious hearings, reported to the Senate a bill for the independence of the Philippines. This year the House committee, for a period of approximately two weeks, I believe, heard every phase of the subject, and again the Senate committee held long and exhaustive hearings, and at least one thing developed about which there can be no dispute. In the hearings in 1930 and in the hearings before the House committee and the Senate committee this year all witnesses but two agreed, and the reports will show that they thought it was the duty of Congress to settle this question at this session.

There were those who wanted immediate independence, those who wanted independence in 5 years, or 10 years, or 20 years, but without exception all witnesses agreed that the Filipino people could not adjust their business, their political or economic life, nor could the American investor properly protect his interests, until a definite date for the termination of the United States sovereignty should be decided upon.

In that long list of witnesses before the House committee and before the Senate committee there were but two witnesses in disagreement, and they proposed an impossible plan, which, I believe, came from the Bureau of Insular Affairs. Instead of setting a definite date for independence, they recommended that we should try to describe in the law imaginary conditions, which had to be fulfilled before independence could come.

Trying to be accommodating, trying to meet the wishes of everybody, we discussed this question with the legislative counsel of the Senate and House. They said it was an impossible thing to do that, that no such law could be written, and I have been unable to find a lawyer in either the House committee or the Senate committee who thought that it was possible for the Congress of the United States to describe an imaginary condition, and then say that when that imaginary condition had been complied with, independence should be granted. With the exception of those two witnesses during the three hearings every witness said that uncertain relations between the Philippines and the United States are paralyzing the Philippine Islands.

What did the committee do? On the House side all but 2 of a committee of 21 Congressmen, representing 19 States, voted, as I understand it, to report the bill to the House. On the Senate side 15 Senators, having held a second hearing, reported a bill to the Senate. Without exception, on both sides of Congress, they agreed that something should be done. The eloquent champion of immediate independence, whose name is a household word in the Philippines, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], favored a short period. The distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who will to-night present a substitute for the bill proposed by the committee, last year favored a 10-year period and his substitute to-day is for a 20-year period. The Senator from Utah was originally for immediate independence. Since he has thought it over, he favors a three or four year period. I must confess that at the outset I was an advocate of a 5-year period, but certain historical facts and evidence that came before our committee, and which were conclusive, caused me to change my mind.

The distinguished chairman of the House committee, who is in this Chamber to-night, was an advocate of early independence for the Philippines, but as witness after witness disclosed the fact that the Congress of the United States had created an artificial economic condition for which the Filipino people were not responsible and made it plain that if a period of readjustment was not allowed it would be harmful to the Filipinos and harmful to us, he changed his views and so a bill was reported to the House providing for independence in eight years. But in the House bill the philosophy of the measure, beginning even with its title, is the same as that of the Senate measure. It is expressed in virtually the same language.

One of the exceptions is that it provides for independence in eight years, fixing what both the House committee and the Senate committee called a status quo on importations of Philippine products; that is to say, limiting importations of these products to the present production capacity of these Philippine industries, and applying the tariff on amounts in excess of the limitations specified in the bill. These provisions are also contained in the Senate bill.

The Senate bill allows 5 years of the 15-year interval for the operation of a graduated tariff, the hope being that during this period the Filipino people may, without great detriment, become accustomed to the tariff burden. So that the House bill provides for independence at the end of 8 years, with a limitation on certain Philippine products meantime, while the Senate bill provides for limitation on imports for 10 years and thereafter 5 years of tariff duties.

There is one other difference. We know the attitude of the people on the Pacific coast. The House bill provides for an immediate limitation of Filipino immigration to this country. That was written into the House bill. The Senate bill has a little different provision. The prohibition of Philippine immigration commences under the Senate bill at the time the Filipinos adopt the constitution, so that between the one bill and the other there is a difference of a period of one year. It is true that the distinguished Congressman from California, Mr. WELCH, and others, believed that that one year might be dangerous, that it might be too long. With these exceptions, the bills are very much the same.

Now, what is the opposition? In the House less than 65 out of 435 Representatives do not favor Philippine independence. In the Senate, unless I am very much mistaken, very seriously mistaken, at least 75 Senators favor the independence of the Philippine people. I think there are more; I think that is the minimum. There are some differences of opinion. The very able and distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] will to-night discuss his substitute. I shall not discuss it now except to say that the Senator's philosophy is one which he held alone. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] believes the period preceding independence is too long. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who, I believe favors Philippine independence, because everything in his career indicates his prepossession for freedom and democracy and self-determination, is prevented from arriving at a conclusion because of a constitutional question. So far as I have been able to ascertain, he is the only Senator who contends that Congress does not have the right to give the island people their liberty without a constitutional amendment.

President McKinley 10 days after the treaty had been ratified told the American people:

> The whole subject is now with Congress; and Congress is the voice, the conscience, and the judgment of the American people. Upon their judgment and conscience can we not rely?

In 1924 the question was submitted to the Attorney General, who on April 30 of that year, in a formal opinion on the question, said:

> The Philippine Islands have never been incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof. They are held as an insular possession, appurtenant to the United States but not incorporated into the United States. (See Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U. S. 244, 341–342; Dorr v. U. S., 195 U. S. 138.) The Constitution of the United States has never been extended to the Philippine Islands. It has been so extended to the Territory of Alaska by congressional enactment. (Rasmussen v. U. S., 197 U. S. 516.)
> Under the Constitution of the United States Congress has complete control over Territories. It likewise has such control over insular possessions, and may do with such possession as it may see fit. If Congress deems it expedient to grant complete independence to the people of the Philippine Islands or a limited independence, it may, in my judgment, do so.

More recently a memorandum on the subject, likewise accepting the view that Congress does possess such power, was prepared by the office of the legislative counsel of the United States Senate, and was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, 1930. Justice Malcolm, of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, in his treatise on Philippine Constitutional Law—page 173—upholds a similar view.

The power of Congress to alienate territory or to give the Philippines their independence may be supported on any one of six grounds: First, because such power is expressly granted to Congress, under the Constitution; second, because the power may be implied from powers expressly granted to Congress; third, because the power resides in Congress by virtue of its resultant powers; fourth, because it is inherent in sovereignty; fifth, because the power exists in the President and in the Senate of the United States by virtue of the treaty-making power; and, sixth, because it resides in Congress as a power implied from the power to pass legislation necessary to carry out treaty commitments.

Since the decision in the insular cases, cited in the opinion of the Attorney General, there has been no serious contention by anyone, except some of the extremists in the opposition, that the Congress did not have power to grant it. All recognized constitutional authorities concede that the inherent right of a sovereign to acquire territory unquestionably includes the right to dispose of it. And until the Philippines are incorporated as a part of the territory of the United States, which the Supreme Court says has not been done, the Congress undoubtedly has the constitutional authority to grant independence.

Judge Elliott has this to say:

> "The Constitution," said Chief Justice Marshall, "confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently, that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory by conquest or by treaty." Under the provisions of the Constitution Congress may either sell the territory which it so acquires, hold and govern it by such rules and regulations as it deems wise to make, or carve it up into numerous States and admit them into the Union. It follows that until new States are created out of the national territorial property and admitted into the Union the Constitution of the United States is not in force in such territory.

We all remember the debates and uncertainty concerning the question of a permament retention of the Philippines which developed in the year 1899. At that time Judge James Bradley Thayer, professor of law at Harvard University, read a paper to which was given a place on the front page of nearly every newspaper in this country, and which was discussed with approval by the public. It may be said that it decided the American mind with regard to the legal right to acquire and dispose of the Philippines. It was intended for the nonprofessional mind. Judge Thayer, in his opinion, stated very emphatically that he was opposed to the acquisition of the Philippines. His reasoning has never since been successfully gainsaid by anyone. The address is found in Thayer's Legal Essays, beginning on page 153. This learned legal authority devoted nearly 30 pages to the subject. I quote:

> Let me at once and shortly say that, in my judgment, there is no lack of power in our Nation, of legal, constitutional power, to govern these islands as colonies, substantially as England might govern them; that we have the same power that other nations have; and that we may, subject to the agreements of the treaty, sell them, if we wish, or abandon them, or set up native governments in them, with or without a protectorate, or govern them ourselves. * * * The Constitution has to be read side by side with the customs and laws of nations. The operation of our Constitution is not to create a legislative body which is wholly bereaved of power to do anywhere the things which are forbidden within the United States. It is not stricken with inability, destitute of power, as if paralyzed, on these subjects, anywhere and everywhere and under all circumstances.

So there we are, with the House almost united, with the Senate more than two-thirds in favor of independence, with the opposition to this bill coming from patriotic Senators who are not opposing independence as such, but who favor other plans or different limitations.

Some amendments will be proposed to the bill. Some I have proposed myself. These have been suggested by the former ambassador to Japan, Mr. Forbes. There will be others who question the accuracy of both the House and the Senate committees in arriving at their figures on what we call the status quo. They want to lower those figures. But as to independence, as to freedom for those people, as to dispelling the uncertainty, there is not a man in the House committee of 21 or in the Senate committee of 15 who hesitates for a moment to say that the question should be settled, and settled by this Congress.

The latest expression of opinion of a President of the United States is that of Mr. Hoover, who said some months ago:

> Independence of the Philippines at some time has been directly or indirectly promised by every President and by the Congress. The question is only one of time.

As this session continues it will be found that the only question is not whether it should be settled, but when, and men's minds may disagree upon that point.

But, unfortunately, the American people are not getting the story correctly. There has been suppression of news. There has been a steady campaign of distortion, so that the American people do not understand the conditions in the Philippines. In the Philippines there are 13,000,000 Malays, all Malays, who want their independence because it is a thing they have in their hearts. If they did not covet independence they would be unworthy of it. We have encouraged in them their aspirations for freedom that come to every nation and every man of every nation.

Our Army officers on the 4th of July read to them the Declaration of Independence. Two thousand American schoolteachers have taught them every page of American history. Patrick Henry is the most-quoted man in the Philippine Islands. What is the situation there to-day? Thirteen million Malays are wanting independence; 12,000,000 of the 13,000,000 are Christians, and they were Christians 300 years before Dewey entered the harbor of Manila.

There is a curious thing about this discussion. Men are reluctant to say openly and honestly that they are opposed to independence; oh, no. The imperialist of to-day never mentions imperialism; he never mentions trade; he never mentions foreign empire. He puts up a specious plea for more time. He is afraid to tell the truth. No witness, from the Secretary of War down to the merchant and manufacturer, denies for a moment the official promise of Congress and the official declarations of our Presidents. They content themselves with devious, strange, uncertain statements; they are ashamed to say that they oppose the ambitions of these people. They bring forth arguments about Moros. They tell you of the bravery of the Moros; the American promise to the Moros—the veriest drivel, unsupported by history, unsupported by the facts, unsupported by the wishes of the Moros themselves.

Of the 13,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippines only 400,000 are Mohammedan Malays, and large numbers of these have petitioned Congress to give them their independence. I personally saw them in long lines, bearing banners, with their wives and their children, asking for independence from the United States.

We are told that if we give independence to these people, there will be trouble with the Moros. Mr. President, for nine years a Christian Filipino was governor of a province on Mindanao, and during his nine years of administration there was no serious trouble. Some one has built up a fiction about the Sultan of Sulu. I wish the Senate could see the Sultan of Sulu. Commissioner Taft wired President Roosevelt, "The Sultan of Sulu is a little fellow only 4 feet tall; he has seven wives and no children, a thing of which I am sure you do not approve." [Laughter.] Of course he had reference to his height. The Sultan of Sulu, about whom men weep, had been on the pay roll of the British and Spanish Governments for years before we came to the Philippines. The Spaniards found it cheaper to bribe than to fight. The English found it better to pay the head of the Mohammedan Church than to have controversy with him. When our troops went into the Philippines there were only a handful of Moros under Aguinaldo. The men who fought our Army were the Christian Filipinos. The Christian Filipinos have had no trouble with the Mohammedan Filipinos.

After our war of conquest was over and the Christian Filipinos had been disarmed, our army moved down to the Mohammedan islands to stop polygamy, to stop the slave trade, to force the Moros to go to school. Then the trouble came, not between the Christian Filipino and the Moro but between the American who wanted to plant American civilization in the Moro country and the Moro. Of course, the Moros were disarmed, as the Christian Filipinos were disarmed; but the Moro to-day can get a gun in the same way that a Christian Filipino can get one.

What do we find in the Moro country? There are seven Provinces called the Moro Provinces, and the Christians outnumber the Moros in three of the seven. Can it be proposed that because of this fiction the 12,000,000 Christian Filipinos are not entitled to their liberty? I do not believe so. The Senate committee does not believe so; the House committee does not believe so; historians do not believe so.

Certain sentimentalists and opponents of independence exaggerate what they call our promise to the Moros. There never was any promise to the Moro people; it was a promise to the sultan. The full burden of this pension has always been borne by the Philippine treasury. For 20 years the sultan had as prime minister former Senator Hadji Butu, a Moro, a linguist, and a man of very unusual ability. He was recently reported in the American press as being opposed to independence. This was denied by him as soon as his attention was called to the statement. Speaking of the administration of a Filipino governor directing Moro affairs, he made the following statement before the Secretary of the Interior:

> I can assure you that the people of Sulu are entirely satisfied with the actual state of affairs and always will be so if the government of Sulu should be entrusted to Filipino hands. Those of Sulu prefer that the governor of the province should be a Filipino, because if a Moro were nominated he might be partial in his administration. My people wish for and are in conformity with independence (of the Philippines), and when that is conceded, I can assure you that nothing will happen between the Moros and the Christians, not only now, while the majority of the Moro race is uncivilized, but also when the Moros shall have embraced civilization.

Senate President Quezon, who was a former Commissioner to the United States and who is recognized as a leader by all classes in the Philippines, made this statement in 1925:

> One is told that an independent Filipino government would solve the Moro problem by stamping out the Moros. We practically governed the Moros during the seven years of the last administration and had no trouble with them, whereas whenever they have been governed by Americans, there has been continual trouble with them.
> We naturally understand every element of our population better than can foreigners. We never have been guilty of persecuting the non-Christian peoples of the Philippines. We have been fair and generous to them in respect of education, roads, sanitation, and everything else. From this practice there would be no departure under independence. We believe in educating all our people and promoting their prosperity and happiness in order that we may have a great and contented nation.

Every recent writer, without exception, beginning with Garrett, and including Eddy and Millis, has said that in no land in the world is the desire for liberty greater and more overpowering, more insistent than in the Philippines.

It is the younger generation who are the more earnest, more determined. The older generation know what we did for them; how we helped them build roads, introduced sanitation, and gave them our philosophy of the law. The younger generation has forgotten that; the younger generation is demanding the thing that has been demanded all over the world since the beginning of time—the right to govern themselves.

In Manila, where formerly 12,000 Americans lived, only 6,000 remain. Young Americans will not go there, because there is no work for them to do. Those Americans who are left are largely old soldiers, men with gray hair. From Manila comes misinterpretation of news. One newspaper there, owned by an American, has three reporters who send one story to the United States and print a different story in Manila. This paper has a circulation of only 6,000; and, except for it, every magazine, every newspaper in the islands, every organization of the Protestant Church, the Catholic Church, and the Mohammedan Church down to the workers in the factories want independence; and they are going to have it, because we have taught them that they ought to have it.

With regard to these questions there was no disagreement in the House committee; there was no disagreement in the Senate committee. The only disagreement is as to the time and the manner of independence and the question of limitations.

Year after year a commission is sent to the United States by the Philippine people to plead for independence. It is authorized by their legislature and supported with appropriations and from private sources. In these commissions are men like Osmena, and the Resident Commissioners, and Quezon, of whom I have heard men on both sides state afterward, "What an able address, what a scholarly address, what a masterful statement and presentation, these men have made!" And yet because they are of a different color, because they are Malays and we are Caucasians, they are declared not ready for independence. Yet any man here whose mind is not closed, who will read the records of the House and Senate, will find that in the Philippines there is a stable government with a balanced budget. In fact, I believe the Philippine government to-day is, in a financial way, very much better off than some nations of Europe and North and South America. Literacy in the Philippines is high—higher than that of many countries in South America, and higher than that of some of the nations of Europe.

All that the friends of Philippine independence ask of the Senate of the United States is fair play, the expression of an opinion by the Senate. We have tried to put in the RECORD the story of both sides, but we have not occupied the floor of the Senate, and now I want to say, for one, that the only thing we fear is an attempt to adjourn the Senate before we have cast our vote upon this question. If gentlemen have any idea that they will economize time by pursuing that course, let them forget about it now. Because the friends of Philippine independence, so secure in their belief that the Senate will register its vote, have delayed, have acted courteously, and have not interfered with the discussion of the great problems of our own Nation, does not mean that we will permit both Americans and Filipinos again to be abandoned because a branch of the Government does not act.

Go back, if you please, to 1899, and you will find that a change of one vote would have altered the destinies of the Philippines. Go back to 1916, and observe that again a change of one vote would have changed the destinies of the Philippines. Now, with an almost unanimous vote already recorded in the House, and with an overwhelming vote certain in the Senate, it is suggested that we adjourn and go home.

Just one thing more.

Some intemperate person has said that if we give these Philippine people their liberty, there will be trouble in the Philippines; that the presence of United States troops and of United States officials now insures order there.

Mr. President, it may be true that there will be trouble. God knows we have had trouble in our own country. For four years, because men disagreed, the North and the South fought the bloodiest battles in the history of the world. There may be some little trouble; but the Filipino does not anticipate it. He does not believe it will come unless it is fomented and brought about to inflame public opinion in the United States.

What happened when we went into the World War? We took all our white troops out of the Philippines and sent them to Europe. Only Filipino soldiers remained.

We declared war in April, 1917. On May 5 of the same year a monster demonstration was held in Manila. Fifteen thousand Filipinos gathered in front of the Governor General's residence; speeches were made pledging them to any sacrifice for the benefit of the United States.

A special session of the legislature was summoned, and it quickly passed the following resolution:

> We firmly believe that the final triumph of democracy, in securing for the world the principle of nationality for the benefit of the small nations, will finally enable our people to attain the ideals for which we have always struggled, namely, our constitution into a free and independent nation, with a democratic government of law and order, ready to be another instrument of democracy and universal progress.

All through the Provinces the best of the Filipino youths volunteered. Suspicion of the ultimate attitude of the United States regarding independence had disappeared. Here we find them volunteering for duty abroad. Twenty-eight thousand volunteered when only 14,000 were authorized by Washington. The United States spent only $515,000 for their equipment and this preparation. The Filipinos, out of their treasury, expended $2,405,000.

All American troops and the American Navy were withdrawn from the Philippines during the period of the war. The whole government, its policing, and its army were left to the good judgment of the Filipino people.

All agitation for independence ceased. With a fine spirit they did not seize upon this opportunity to press their claims for independence. It is the only period in their history, in connection with our own, in which they have not on every occasion pressed a consideration of their national aspirations.

They organized a corps of 4-minute speakers. They subscribed to the Liberty loan the sum of 23,247,000 pesos, more than double their allotment, and it is significant that of this sum 9,000,000 pesos came from the Provinces, and 95 per cent of those who subscribed were native Filipinos.

In addition to their subscription to the Liberty loans they added another 10,000,000 pesos for the American Red Cross society.

Another significant happening was the fact that while all American soldiers were withdrawn, none but Filipino soldiers and constabulary were left, there was no trouble in the Moro country. It was unusually peaceful during this period. It substantiates the theory of the Filipino that he can get along better with the Moros, who are Malays, and settle possible disputes quicker than can an American who belongs to an alien race.

It is reported that 4,785 Filipinos actually served in the United States Army, enlisting in the United States. Fifty-six were killed. The Navy, which had formerly employed many Asiatics, replaced them by Filipinos, so that in the year 1926 we find there were 4,420 Filipinos in the United States naval service.

In the views presented to the three great committees there was agreement on one thing, and that was that there was demoralizing uncertainty. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] wishes independence to come a little earlier than the rest of us do. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] had his own plan and his own philosophy; but he, too, is for independence. However, a little group in Manila and another little group in New York have flooded this Congress with misinformation. I have seen upon the desks of Senators a reported poll of the editorial opinion in the United States. That poll was taken months ago. It was conducted on the basis of absolute, complete, and immediate independence. Take the newspapers of my own State of Missouri, six months ago they were against independence, or doubtful about it. But there has come a change.

So, Mr. President, the friends of Philippine independence have but one request to make of the Senate and its Members. That is to permit Senators to register an expression of opinion on the bill that came here from the House and that has been on the table of the Senate since the 4th day of last April.

Changes may be suggested, but those are matters of small detail. The great thing, the big thing, the human thing is to redeem the promise made to the Filipino people, so that they may adjust their political and their economic affairs and enter the family of nations, a grateful people, a happy people, a people whose friendship and affection for America will be in part our reward for keeping faith with them.

I will not take the time of the Senate in discussing whether or not these people are ready for independence. On last Saturday night, for a half hour, the speaker of the house of the Philippine Legislature talked on the radio to the people of America. In courtesy, in logic, in fairness his speech was a masterpiece; and I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD to give the lie, if you please, to men who have not his ability, who have not his courage, who have not his patriotism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I consider it a great privilege to have this opportunity to speak to Americans all over the United States about the Philippines.

Among the important problems demanding definite action by the Congress is that of determining the destiny of those islands. What is the United States going to do with the Philippines?

More than 30 years ago, as an incident of your war against Spain for the liberation of Cuba, the United States acquired sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. Territorial aggrandizement was not the purpose of America in that war. Only the sincerest altruism moved her in that conflict. At that time President McKinley and the Congress of the United States made America's policies plain both to the Filipino people and to the world. They declared that America was to exercise sovereignty over the Philippines not for the purpose of exploitation or colonization but in humble obedience to what was considered the will of Divine Providence. Prompted by the same impulses that actuated her in Cuba, America was to receive the Philippine Islands in trust for our people until we should be trained in self-government and become able to manage our own affairs. Meanwhile the islands were to be governed and developed for the benefit of the Filipino people. It was repeatedly announced that the Filipinos were to receive training in democracy; free public schools were to be opened; sanitation and communications improved, public order established, a sound financial system created, and courts instituted for the dispensation of speedy and impartial justice to rich and poor alike. It was then declared—and the declaration has been reiterated by every succeeding President of the United States—that when the Filipinos had demonstrated capacity to govern themselves independence was to be granted them.

In the Jones Act, passed in 1916, the Congress of the United States gave legal sanction to this policy, and on behalf of the American people promised the Filipinos that they should have independence as soon as a stable government was established in their country. Four years later President Wilson, in a special message, officially certified to Congress that the condition precedent imposed upon the Filipino people had been satisfied, and urged the Congress to do its duty by the Philippines and grant them their independence. Some time before President Wilson's certification, Theodore Roosevelt, than whom no man then living was better informed as to American policy regarding the Philippines, promptly counseled a similar course, not only for the benefit of the Philippine people and as a fulfillment of a generous pledge freely given them but also for the advantage and the security of the United States. On that occasion Mr. Roosevelt said:

"The Philippines, from a military standpoint, are a source of weakness to us. The present administration has promised explicitly to let them go, and by its action has rendered it difficult to hold them against any serious foreign foe. These being the circumstances, the islands should at an early moment be given their independence without any guaranty whatever by us and without our retaining any foothold in them."

Thus it is that the problem of enacting legislation to fulfill the promise of Philippine independence has been confronting Congress for more than 12 years. No one denies that independence was promised to the Filipino people. As President Hoover stated recently, there remains for determination only the question of time: When shall independence be granted? The Filipino people believe, and many thoughtful Americans agree with Mr. Wilson and Mr. Roosevelt, that the time has come for such legislation.

In the course of the last three years the efforts of the Filipino people to induce the Congress of the United States to legislate on the Philippine problem have attracted the interest and support of many important elements in America. Before that, it was simply a question of the Filipino people's longing for independence; for the United States, it involved the discharge of a national obligation, but lacked the urge of material interest. Since 1929, however, the problem has had a practical significance to many groups in your country. They feel that American policy respecting the Philippines affects their economic interests, and so they have cooperated with us in our endeavor for early congressional action on this problem.

Material considerations alone have not actuated these elements in support of our independence. They contend that the Filipinos of right should have their independence, because it was promised them, because they are ready for it, and because America has completed her task in the islands. In urging Congress to perform the righteous duty of granting independence, these American groups submit that continued unrestricted free imports from the Philippine Islands are injurious to American economic interests. Among these groups to which I refer are more than six and a half million farmers of America speaking through their three national organizations—the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union. Allied with these in advocating Philippine independence are the dairy organizations and the producers of vegetable oils. The American farmer maintains that Philippine sugar and coconut oil, produced at lower cost, and entering the United States free of duty, compete disastrously with American beet and cane sugar, dairy products, cottonseed, and other vegetable oils and animal fats.

These agricultural groups realize that free trade between the United States and the Philippines is a basic fact in present American and Philippine relations, and that, accordingly, while American sovereignty remains, ethical and economic considerations forbid that import duties should be collected on Philippine products coming into the United States. Congress itself has repeatedly taken this stand on the ground that it would be unjust and indefensible to tax Philippine articles entering the United States while at the same time the American Government compels the Philippine people to continue under the American flag, against their wishes, and while, moreover, they are obliged to admit duty free to the islands American products and manufactures.

While American farmers are thus seeking freedom from competition with Philippine imports, influential elements, on the other hand, namely, those whose investments in the Philippines depend upon the continuance of an American free market, and those business concerns who sell American articles in the Philippines, claim that present free trade with the Philippines can not suddenly be terminated without serious detriment to them. They cite that over $200,000,000 of American capital is invested in the islands and that American-Philippine trade is approximately $200,000,000 a year. They assert that the Philippines have enlarged their purchasing power as a market for American products and manufactures.

Other important elements which have taken active interest in the question of Philippine independence are American wage-workers as represented by the Federation of Labor and the railroad brotherhoods, all together numbering more than 5,000,000. These organizations have long favored the cause of Philippine independence. The American Federation of Labor opposed the acquisition of the Philippines in 1899 when it was first accomplished. In the beginning, the American federation urged independence on purely moral grounds, maintaining that imperialistic colonization was abhorrent to American traditions and the principles which have given birth and life to this Republic. In the platforms of the federation for the last 30 years Philippine independence has been consistently advocated. Of late, however, labor leaders on the Pacific coast have complained against the unrestricted immigration of Philippine laborers into the United States. They say that in this time of widespread unemployment the continuous influx of Philippine laborers makes the condition of the American worker more difficult. Hence the attention of American workingmen all over the United States has been focused on the Philippine problem, and they are now seeking more insistently early independence for the Philippines.

I have indicated to you the most important elements of your population who are manifesting interest in a speedy solution of the Philippine problem. To these may be added first, those who advocate independence as a means of economy in American governmental expenditures; second, those who believe with Roosevelt that continued possession of the Philippines is dangerous to American national security; and third, those who, recalling the admonition of Lincoln, maintain American democracy is unsuited to the government of colonies.

While different American elements are calling for immediate action on the Philippine problem for practical, economic, and political reasons, something of the sort is happening also in the Philippines. The Filipino people are now advocating independence not only in order to satisfy their natural yearning for self-government and to become the arbiters of their own destiny, but for very practical, economic reasons as well. While uncertainty prevails as to their future political status the economic development of their country is impossible. How long shall American sovereignty continue? Until when shall Philippine products be admitted free of duty into the United States? What markets shall be opened to the Philippines in after years? What shall be the prevailing standards of living and of wages in so far as these affect production costs? What interest will capital demand before it will seek investment in the Philippines? These questions and others of equal importance in the field of practical economics can not be answered by the Filipino people. Their progress has been checked, especially since the agitation against the free entry of their products into the United States was started here three years ago. While not reproachful of America, they are dissatisfied with present conditions which keep them in ignorance of the things most vital to their happiness and progress and leave them helpless, their spirit broken, their initiative and energy hampered, while the rest of the world strives upward to new levels of progress and social justice in the midst of universal depression.

Thirteen million people live in the Philippines. They are men of flesh and blood like those of this and other countries. Christians for nearly 400 years, in close contact with western civilization during that period, their outlook in life, their aspirations, their ambitions, their sense of pride, and their national consciousness differ but little from those of Americans. We want to know our future. We want to know whether or not the United States will give us independence. Hardly anything can be worse than the uncertainty in which we now live.

We believe that the upbuilding of the Philippine nation has been accomplished, so far as it can be, through American assistance. The rest we must achieve ourselves by our own efforts.

We have developed responsible political institutions suitable to our people. Public order is so generally and so rigidly maintained that few, if any, of the independent nations of the world are freer from crime and lawlessness than ours. We have a passion for education. More than one-tenth of our total population is in our public schools. We expend nearly a third of our governmental income on popular instruction. Our courts of justice command the confidence of the people and are administered with honesty and impartiality. We have steadily improved and enlarged agencies for the promotion of public health and welfare. Our systems of communication are modern and extensive.

In the present era of general depression the finances of the Philippine government are in healthy condition. By practicing the strictest economy we have been able to maintain a balanced budget. Our currency is sound and stable and is, perhaps, the only currency in the world having behind it a reserve larger than the total circulation. The net bonded indebtedness of the Philippines is only $60,000,000, and our government is regularly meeting its obligations, both as to principal and interest on these bonds.

Some opponents of Philippine independence fear that if the United States withdraws its sovereignty, Japan will annex the islands to her empire. That objection has seemed to gather weight because of recent events in the Far East. But we who are familiar with the situation and the present happenings in the Orient have no dread of this so-called Japanese menace. Let me tell you why we discount it. In the first place, if Japan had had any desire to possess the Philippines, she could have taken them from Spain years before the United States acquired them. Her quick and decisive victory over China in 1894 raised Japan at once to a position of dominance in the Far East and to a place among the great powers of the world. Spain could not have resisted so mighty an adversary.

Japanese expansion has been to the mainland of Asia. Instead of taking the Philippines she conquered a large area of Manchuria from Russia—a very much more powerful nation than Spain was—and subsequently added Korea to her domain. She is now making further advances into Manchuria. In those regions she finds not only the coal and the iron and the agricultural products she needs for her industrial uses and her teeming population, but she finds also the kind of climate that suits the Japanese people, who are to colonize these new possessions of hers.

The Japanese do not flourish in a tropical climate. Though there are no laws forbidding Japanese immigration, there are now only about 8,000 Japanese in the Philippines. This number is insignificant compared with 138,000 domiciled in the United States. Thirty-seven years ago Japan took Formosa, an island with the same climate as that of the Philippines, and ever since has sought to colonize it with her subjects. They have refused to go there or remain there in large numbers. To-day not above 300,000 of them are to be found in Formosa.

In the light of these facts I think we can accept the assurances given by Japanese statesmen that Japan does not covet the Philippines. Only a few months ago, when an American of high official rank hinted that Japan probably would seize the Philippines after their independence, representatives of the Japanese Government disclaimed any such intention. "We have no desire to acquire the Philippines," said this spokesman of the Japanese ministry. "We are unable to see any advantage to Japan if America grants their independence. We are chiefly interested in the islands as a probable market near home, but we doubt whether independence would improve that market. Probably the reverse." This same Japanese spokesman expressed the view that Japan would be willing to sign a treaty with the United States to guarantee Philippine independence.

All the facts of importance bearing on the Philippines were presented before two committees of Congress at the beginning of the present session. Indeed, the hearings held by both the House and the Senate committee early this year merely supplemented previous investigations and studies made by committees of Congress in the course of the last 10 years. All the facts needed for an intelligent comprehension of the problem have been made available in official records. The conditions now prevailing in the Philippines have been closely examined. The testimony of every person who desired to be heard either for or against independence was taken.

After considering many bills providing for Philippine independence the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, on March 15, last, favorably reported the Hare bill by a practically unanimous vote.

The Hare bill grants independence at the expiration of a transitional period of eight years. During this period the Philippine people will enjoy practically complete autonomy as to internal affairs under a constitution approved by them, subject only to such restrictions and limitations as are necessary to safeguard the sovereignty of the United States.

While the House committee was considering Philippine bills, the Senate committee conducted its own hearings, and on February 24 of this year, by an almost unanimous vote, reported the Hawes-Cutting bill. This bill grants independence at the end of 15 years, if the Philippine people, in a plebiscite held expressly for the purpose, shall vote in favor of independence. During the intervening period, the islands will be governed in virtually the same manner as provided in the House bill. In general outline, the Senate bill follows the Fairfield bill, which John W. Weeks, Secretary of War in the Cabinet of President Coolidge, officially recommended for enactment in 1924.

The purpose of the transitional period—eight years in the House bill, and 15 years in the Senate bill—is to allow for the adjustment of economic conditions in the islands, especially of their trade relations with the United States.

Both the House bill and the Senate bill harmonize divergent views of different groups likely to be affected by Philippine independence. American agriculture is protected from what it considers hurtful competition with unrestricted free importation of Philippine products, and American workers are safeguarded from competition with Filipino immigrant labor. On the other hand, these bills recognize the necessity for a gradual accommodation of Philippine business and industry to the new conditions after independence. This is dictated both by fairness and justice. Twenty-five years ago free-trade relations were established between the United States and the Philippine Islands against the expressed desire of the Filipino people. As a consequence of free trade, Philippine industries and commerce with the United States have developed on that basis. Obviously, these trade relations can not be terminated abruptly without serious injury to Philippine economic interests and to American trade with the islands. Both require a definite time to prepare for the change. Investments made on the basis of free trade must be given sufficient time for adjustment or liquidation without loss. Philippine industries must also be given time to establish themselves on a competitive basis before they are placed outside the tariff walls of the United States.

Regarding military posts in the islands, both the House bill and the Senate bill reserve to the United States the right to retain and maintain military and naval bases in the Philippines after their independence has been recognized. This is a privilege which the United States may or may not exercise, as it chooses——

The Philippine representatives for some time past have observed strong indications that a majority of Congress were in favor of independence. The only reason why a bill has not been enacted is the difficulty in obtaining the necessary agreement for its consideration. For it is natural that the Congress should give preference to measures which affect the American people directly. Recently, however, Philippine independence, having assumed practical significance to large groups of Americans, has become a measure of major importance to the Congress of the United States.

The Philippine bill came up for consideration in the House of Representatives on April 4 of this year. After a brief discussion, under suspension of the rules, the bill passed by a vote of 306 to 47. The Philippine Commissioners are informed that many of those who voted against the bill would have voted for it if more time had been allowed for its consideration. Of the Members absent and not voting, at least 40 have since expressed their approval of the bill. The favorable action taken by the House is in large measure due to the able and zealous leadership of the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, Congressman HARE, of South Carolina.

When the Hare bill reached the Senate the Senate Committee on Territories agreed to substitute the provisions of the Senate bill for those of the House bill.

Discussions of proposals affecting the Philippines, as, for example, when it was proposed to levy duty on coconut oil and copra in the tax bill, also show a general sentiment in favor of Philippine independence among the Members of the Senate.

The bill is among the five important measures listed in the Senate's legislative program, which was prepared by the program committee of the Republican caucus, and virtually agreed to by the whole membership of the Senate. In view, however, of the congested Senate calendar in these last days of the session we are encountering serious difficulty in obtaining time for consideration of the Philippine bill.

Our commission in Washington is daily seeking action on the bill by the Senate. We are quite aware that many important bills still pending must be enacted before adjournment. We realize that such bills must have preference. We feel, however, that the significance of the Philippine problem is understood by the Members of the Senate, and we trust it will receive attention this session. We have asked for a few night sessions to dispose of the bill, and the Senate to-day by unanimous consent, agreed to commence its discussion next Monday night. Our commission believes that three night sessions would be sufficient for proper disposition of the measure, which is nonpartisan. For the last 30 years Philippine independence has been a nonpartisan question. We wish it to remain such. Our hope is it shall ever be maintained on the high level of altruism, justice, and humanitarian service upon which President McKinley placed it.

Passage of the independence bill is vital to the Filipino people. Upon it depend their happiness and future welfare. Further delay will work injury both to our interests and those of the United States. The problem must be settled now, and settled right.

Only a few hours of deliberation by the Senate is needed. We trust and we pray that the representatives of the American people will not begrudge these few hours for such a noble cause. When our independence has been achieved, our greatest concern will be to prove ourselves worthy of America, preserving and enlarging the heritage of benefits we have received from her, and always cherishing the gratitude we now feel for all she has done to help us build a free and prosperous nation.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I am very anxious to listen to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and I now ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks an analysis of the Senate bill, some reports, some statistical tables, and other matters relating to this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ANALYSIS OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL (S. 3377, 72D CONG.)

Following is a brief analysis of the bill reported by the committee:

Section 1: Section 1 authorizes the Philippine Legislature to provide for a constitutional convention to formulate and draft a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

Section 2: Section 2 sets forth certain requirements as to the character of the constitution, including the requirement of a republican form of government, bill of rights, and certain mandatory provisions dealing with particular subjects. It is to be noted that among these mandatory requirements is the provision that trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States shall be upon the basis prescribed in section 6 (post).

Section 3: Section 3 provides for the submission of the constitution to the President of the United States. After the constitutional convention has completed the draft, the President is to determine whether or not it conforms to the provisions of the act. If he finds that it so conforms, he is to certify that fact to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, who will advise the constitutional convention. If the President finds that the constitution does not so conform, he is to advise the Governor General stating wherein in his judgment the constitution does not so conform, and submitting provisions sufficient in his judgment to meet the defects. The Governor General is then required to submit the message to the constitutional convention for further action by them, and so on until the President and the constitutional convention are in agreement.

Section 4: After the President has approved the constitution it is to be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held within four months after the President certifies his approval. If a majority of the votes cast are for the constitution, the Governor General, within 30 days after receipt of certification of the result of the election from the Philippine Legislature, shall issue a proclamation for the election of officers of the government provided for in the constitution. The election must be held not earlier than three months nor later than six months after the proclamation by the Governor General. The result of the election is to be certified to the President of the United States, who issued a proclamation announcing the results of the election, and thereupon the existing Philippine government terminates and the new government begins under the constitution. If a majority of the votes cast are against the constitution, the existing government of the Philippine Islands continues and the remainder of the act does not take effect.

Section 5: This section provides for the transfer of all property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaties with Spain, excepting, however, such land or other property as has heretofore been designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States and such land or other property as may have been sold or otherwise disposed of.

Section 6: This section sets up the trade relations between the United States and the new government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. Generally speaking, the section provides for the continuance of the present relations with the following modifications:

(1) After the date of the inauguration of the new government and until the Philippines become independent, there shall be imposed on the following articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of the limits hereinafter set forth the full rates of duty under the tariff laws of the United States:

In the case of refined sugar, 50,000 long tons.

In the case of unrefined sugar, 800,000 long tons.

In the case of coconut oil, 200,000 long tons.

In the case of cordage, 3,000,000 pounds.

In the event that the limit is reached in any case the above quantities are to be allocated in each year thereafter, under export permits issued by the government of the Philippine Islands, to the producers or manufacturers proportionately on the basis of their exportation to the United States in the preceding year, except in the case of unrefined sugar, where the basis for the allocation is production in the preceding year instead of exportation to the United States.

(2) After the expiration of the tenth year the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands is to impose an export tax on all articles that may be exported to the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of existing law as modified by the limitation provisions above discussed. This will include the articles above enumerated, within the limitations specified, as well as other articles which would otherwise come in free of duty. The full tariff upon amounts in excess of the limitations specified continues.

The progressive export tax is as follows: During the eleventh year after the inauguration of the new government, 5 per cent of the rates of duty required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries; during the twelfth year, 10 per cent of such rates; during the thirteenth year, 15 per cent of such rates; during the fourteenth year, 20 per cent of such rates; after the expiration of the fourteenth year, 25 per cent of such rates.

The government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands is required to place all funds received from such export taxes in a sinking fund which, in addition to other moneys available for that purpose, shall be applied solely to the discharge of the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands.

Section 7: This section sets forth certain relationships that obtain between the new government of the Philippine Islands and the Government of the United States, particularly as concerns supervisory authority to be exercised by this Government over the islands. Among other things, the section provides for the approval of amendments to the Philippine constitution by the President of the United States; authorizes the President to suspend the taking effect of the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the Philippine government in certain cases; requires the chief executive of the Philippine government to make an annual report to the President and the Congress of the United States; authorizes the appointment of a high commissioner to the government of the commonwealth of the Philippines, prescribes the nature of his office and his duties and compensation; and provides for the selection of a Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands to the United States, with a seat in the House of Representatives.

Section 8: Generally speaking, section 8 applies the immigration laws to the Philippine Islands after the date of the inauguration of the new government. Although citizens of the Philippine Islands are excepted from the provisions of section 13 (c) of the immigration act of 1924, prohibiting the immigration of aliens ineligible to citizenship (with certain exceptions), the Philippine Islands is given a quota of 100, which practically puts them in a class with other orientals. The distinction is in the admission of certain nonquota classes in the case of Filipinos, not permitted other orientals.

The exclusion provisions, however, do not apply to Filipinos coming into the Territory of Hawaii, but migration from Hawaii to the mainland is prohibited.

Section 9: After the expiration of the fifteenth year and before the expiration of the seventeenth year after the inauguration of the new government the people of the Philippine Islands shall vote on the question of Philippine independence. If the plebiscite is in favor of independence, the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands reports to the President of the United States, who issues a proclamation announcing the results of the vote, and within two years the President shall withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippine Islands, and on behalf of the United States shall recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands. It is provided, however, that prior to such withdrawal the constitution shall be amended to include certain provisions for the adjustment of property rights between the United States and the Philippine Islands, the safeguarding of property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States, provision for acquisition by the United States of lands necessary for coaling or naval stations, the assumption by the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands of the debts and liabilities of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, cities, municipalities, and instrumentalities, the assumption of continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty with Spain, and provision, by way of further assurance, for embodying the foregoing provisions in a treaty with the United States.

If the plebiscite is against Philippine independence, report is to be made to the Congress of the United States for their action regarding the future status of the Philippine Islands, but until Congress otherwise provides the Philippine Islands shall revert to the status established by the act for the first 10 years after the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, i. e., immigration restrictions and limitation upon imports.

Section 10: This section provides for notification to foreign governments of the recognition of the independence of the Philippine Islands.

Section 11: Under this section, after the Philippine Islands have become independent, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the same rates of duty as upon like articles imported from other foreign countries, but provision is made for a trade conference within six months after the vote on the question of Philippine independence if the vote is in favor of independence. The purpose of the conference is to formulate recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands. This provision, however, is to have no effect whatever upon the provisions of the act relating to procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which independence is to be had.

Section 12: This section continues in effect, except as otherwise provided in the act, laws in force in the Philippine Islands and provides that the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be deemed successor to the present government. It further repeals all laws relating to the present government of the Philippine Islands and its administration, as of the date of the inauguration of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

Section 13: This section provides that the act shall not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for that purpose as may be provided by the Philippine Legislature.

REPORT OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES AND INSULAR AFFAIRS OF THE SENATE, AT THE SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS, FAVORABLY REPORTING A BILL (S. 3822) GRANTING INDEPENDENCE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Your Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to whom was referred a number of bills providing for, or relating to, Philippine independence, respectfully report that they have considered all such bills, and a majority of the committee reports favorably S. 3822, "A bill to provide for the withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands and for the recognition of their independence; to provide for notification thereof to foreign governments; to provide for the assumption by the Philippine government of obligations under the treaty with Spain; to define trade and other relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands on the basis of a progressive scale of tariff duties preparatory to complete independence; to provide for the calling of a convention to frame a constitution for the government of the Philippine Islands; to provide for certain mandatory provisions of the proposed constitution; to provide for the submission of the constitution to the Filipino people and its submission to the Congress of the United States for approval; to provide for the adjustment of property rights between the United States and the Philippine Islands; to provide for the acquisition of land by the United States for coaling and naval stations in the Philippine Islands; to continue in force certain statutes until indepence has been granted, and for other purposes," and recommends that it do pass with the following amendments:

(1) On page 5, line 2, between the words "of" and "an," insert the following: "an adequate system of sanitation and."

(2) On page 6, line 3, between the words "States" and "Commissioner," insert the word "High."

(3) On page 16, line 9, strike out the words "such termination" and in their place insert the following: "the passage of this act."

The other bills before your committee were S. 204, providing for the withdrawal of the United States from the Philippine Islands; S. 3108, to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution, etc.; Senate Joint Resolution 113, requesting the President to call a conference on the Philippine question; Senate Resolution 199, to investigate the feasibility of tariff autonomy for the Philippines; and S. 3379, to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution, etc.

EXTENT OF INQUIRY

Your committee at various times between January 15 and May 22, 1930, held public and executive hearings on all of the bills mentioned.

Witnesses were heard by the committee both for and against the proposed measures. These witnesses included the officially authorized representatives of the Philippine people sent to this country for the purpose of presenting the Philippine cause; Americans with business interests in the Philippines, economists, political leaders, and experts familiar with every phase of the Philippine question.

At the conclusion of public hearings, your committee decided to hear also the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy in executive session. The Secretary of State also appeared at one open session and a letter from the Secretary of War, detailing his views on the question of Philippine independence, was made a matter of record.

Among the Filipinos heard by your committee were Hon. Manuel Roxas, speaker of the House of Representatives of the Philippine Islands; Hon. Manuel Briones, majority leader of the Philippine House; Hon. Pedro Gil, floor leader of the minority party in the Philippine House of Representatives; and Hon. Pedro Guevara and Hon. Camilo Osias, Resident Commissioners of the Philippine Islands.

It is pertinent to state that the Philippine commission represented both the minority and majority political parties, as well as the different sections of the Philippines. They asserted, without contradiction, that they voiced the unanimous desire of all political parties and peoples in their islands for Philippine independence.

Your committee calls particular attention to the extensive array of facts and figures concerning the economic, political, social, racial, historical, and geographical phases of the Philippine question which may be found either in the 700 pages of testimony taken by the committee or in the many speeches on this subject delivered by Members of the Senate and House and reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In addition, there are available the facts presented to the House Ways and Means Committee and to the Senate Finance Committee during the consideration of tariff problems; the testimony obtained by the Commerce Committee of the Senate on the question of the extension of the coastwise shipping laws, and statements and data recorded in the hearings of the House Committee on Immigration on the subject of Filipino exclusion.

It is doubtful whether any material facts relating to the Philippine question have not been made accessible in the records of the present Congress.

Your committee further calls attention to the fact that although the Philippine question has never, since the occupation of the islands in 1898, been entirely outside the contemplation of Congress, the question has not heretofore (with the possible exception of the session of 1916) received the detailed and comprehensive consideration that has been given it in the present Congress. So that, in making this majority report to the Senate, your committee feels that little need be left to speculation. The facts may be gathered accurately from the records.

PURPOSES OF BILL REPORTED

In a general way S. 3822 may be said to contain four major purposes, as follows:

(1) To provide for the drafting of a constitution for a free and independent government of the Philippine Islands;

(2) To provide for a ratification by the Philippine people of the constitution so formulated, and the election of governmental officials under the new constitution;

(3) To provide a 5-year period of test for the gradual change in the economic and political relationship between the islands and the United States, thus giving the Philippine people an actual experience of such relationship, and an opportunity, following such experience, to decide at a plebiscite whether they approve or disapprove of separation from the United States.

(4) To provide, in the event of an affirmative vote in the plebiscite, for the final withdrawal of American sovereignty over the islands, with such agreements by treaty or otherwise as may be necessary for the protection of American rights and properties in the Philippines, the liquidation of the public debt of the Philippines, and the retention by the United States of sites for coaling or naval bases as the United States may deem advisable.

UNITED STATES REMAINS IN CONTROL

During the "test" period and under the constitution to be adopted by the Philippine people for this period, the United States, in pursuance of the terms of the bill reported, remains in complete supervision and control of every step taken by the Philippine people toward Philippine independence, and is not to relinquish the islands finally until the provisions of the bill shall have been satisfactorily complied with and until the Congress of the United States shall have approved both the constitution to be framed by the Filipinos and every other step in their progress toward competence as a self-governing people.

DETAILS OF S. 3832

In detail, the bill (S. 3822) provides as follows:

(1) That the Philippine Legislature shall elect delegates to a constitutional convention for the purpose of drafting a constitution for a free and independent government, the expenses of such convention to be provided for by the Philippine Legislature.

(2) That the constitution so formulated shall provide for a government republican in form and adequate to secure a stable, orderly, and free government.

(3) That the constitution so formulated shall, pending the final and complete withdrawal of United States sovereignty, provide among other things as follows:

(a) Citizens and officers of the Philippine Islands shall take the oath of allegiance to the United States.

(b) Religious freedom and tolerance shall be secured and all citizens protected in their religious worship.

(c) Property owned by the United States, and cemeteries, churches, parsonages, convents, and buildings used for religious, charitable, or educational purposes shall be exempt from taxation.

(d) Foreign affairs of the islands shall be under the supervision of the United States.

(e) All acts of the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which shall have the right to annul such acts.

(f) The United States may intervene for the preservation of the government of the islands.

(g) The Philippine government shall maintain public schools in which the language of instruction shall be English, and an adequate system of sanitation for the protection of public health.

(h) No revenue shall be used for sectarian or denominational purposes.

(i) The authority of the high commissioner of the United States to the Philippine Islands shall be fully recognized and accepted.

(4) That after the adoption by the convention of the constitution so formulated, the constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands at an election and they shall vote directly to accept or reject it.

(5) That the constitution so adopted and approved shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for approval or rejection.

(6) That if approved by the Congress, the President of the United States shall certify this fact to the Governor General of the Philippines who shall issue a proclamation for the election of Philippine officials to assume and administer the new government.

(7) That the new government having been thus formed and installed, trade relations between the United States and the Philippines shall be, during the 5-year period, upon the following basis:

(a) During the first year, trade relation shall be as present.

(b) During the second year, 25 per cent of existing duties shall be levied upon all articles imported into the United States from the Philippines, and on all articles imported into the islands from the United States.

(c) During the third year, 50 per cent of such duties shall be levied.

(d) During the fourth year, 75 per cent of such duties shall be levied.

(e) During the fifth year, full duty shall be levied upon imports to both countries in the same manner as on all foreign imports.

The proposals for the gradual application of tariff duties during the period of transition from the present status to complete independence were adopted from the provisions of a bill introduced by Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, a member of this committee.

Should the Philippine people fail to ratify the proposal for independence in the plebiscite, the bill provides that tariff relations between the islands and the United States shall be restored to the basis in effect at the time of the passage of S. 3822.

THE PLEBISCITE

(8) Within the first six months of the fifth year after the adoption and approval of the constitution, and the election of officials under it, the intervening period being the "test" period under the new trade relationships, the Philippine people shall vote on the question of ratifying or rejecting the granting of Philippine independence by the United States, and if in this vote they do so ratify independence, this fact shall be certified to the President of the United States, who shall issue a proclamation withdrawing, at the end of the 5-year period, the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands, transferring to the duly elected officials the government of the islands.

(9) Before the withdrawal of sovereignty, the government of the islands shall make provision for the acquisition by purchase or lease by the United States in the islands of adequate naval bases, shall provide by treaty or otherwise for the protection of property rights of Americans and the United States in the Philippines, and shall, on terms acceptable to the United States, provide for the disposition of all fiscal matters and the settlement of all debts and liabilities.

Your committee desires to emphasize again the fact that the bill (S. 3822) grants independence to the Philippine Islands but not forthwith. The actual withdrawal of sovereignty will depend on the result of the plebiscite, which is to be held only after a test of the new relationship between the islands and the United States and after the Filipinos shall have experienced the effects of independence.

In the requirement for a system of public schools in which English shall be the language of instruction, in the provision for the adoption of what is practically the American Bill of Rights, and in the other provisions of this bill (S. 3822), such as the imposition of tariff barriers, and the stipulation of conditions under which the Philippine people will ultimately vote for freedom or a continuation under the American flag, there are imposed upon the inhabitants of the Philippines demands which involve severe hardships. But in the last analysis the Philippine people must determine their course and destiny.

UNCERTAINTY MUST BE REMOVED

It is significant that, without exception, every witness of the many who appeared before your committee admitted that the present situation of uncertainty as to the political future of the Philippines should be removed. The record contains many appeals for a removal of the unsatisfactory conditions which exist at the present time. Even those who oppose early independence for the Philippines admit that the present dubious status of the islands should not be permitted to continue.

The reasons are manifest. The Filipino is neither a citizen of the United States nor is he a citizen of a free country. A Malayan by race, an oriental geographically and by tradition, a foreigner under certain of our statutory provisions, the Filipino has had 30 years of existence as a pseudo-American. Living 7,000 miles from our western coast, on 7,000 islands in the Far East Pacific, these 13,000,000 people, thrown by a great war into the protective arms of a western nation, find themselves, after a generation, to be in law and in fact neither Americans nor foreigners.

Every witness who appeared at the hearings, whether he was an official of the Federal or the insular government or a private person with admitted economic interests at stake, agreed that a definite policy toward the Philippines would be both necessary and desirable as a means of curing the present uncertainty.

The initiative of the Filipino is hampered by his status. The development of 114,000 square miles of island area is being handicapped and certain manufacturing possibilities are being dwarfed because of the general uncertainty.

American capital, doubtful of the future, declines to enter the islands. Foreign capital, with no voice whatever in the settlement of the problem, will not invest there. Under such conditions satisfactory economic progress is impossible.

ALTERNATIVES BEFORE CONGRESS

It appears from our inquiry and study that the uncertainty can be removed only if and when Congress shall adopt one of the following courses:

(1) Granting immediate independence.

(2) Setting a date in the distant future when independence shall be granted.

(3) Creating what might be termed a "colonial" form of government for the future retention of the Philippines.

(4) Incorporating the Philippines as one or more States of the American Union.

(5) Providing, as in this bill (S. 3822), for the organization of a free government and permitting the Philippine people to determine whether under the new conditions they desire to become independent, and grant them independence.

One of these solutions should be adopted by Congress.

Few Americans will advocate immediate independence. The Filipino representatives ask for immediate independence, although they realize the difficulties of reconstruction and readjustment. They would rather suffer the hardships of an immediate dissolution of ties which bind them to the United States than continue in the disastrous uncertainty. They prefer any hardship to the possibility of their remaining forever a subject people.

As to the second proposal, the mere setting of a date for future independence of the islands gives the Philippine people no opportunity to express their views. Furthermore, it is manifest from the hearings that the fixing of a deferred date for Philippine independence is regarded as a plan to make impossible the ultimate granting of such independence. The Secretary of State, in proposing a long period of time for Philippine independence, very frankly stated he cherished the hope that at the end of that period both the Philippines and the United States would decide to continue their relationship.

Your committee is confident that if the date of independence were set for some time in the remote future the economic ties and commercial considerations that meanwhile will have grown up will militate against any possible future relinquishing of American sovereignty.

We shall not discuss at length in this report the proposal to form a colonial government for the Philippines, as we consider this repugnant to the pledges we have made through our executives and in statutory law dealing with the Philippines.

It is hardly conceivable that we could adopt the fourth proposal; that is, giving the Philippines the status of a State of the Union, in view of the racial, sociological, geographical, and other impediments to this course.

The majority of this committee, therefore, finds the only possible solution of the problem to be in a proposal to make possible the formation of a free government in the Philippines, to permit the Philippine people to weigh the experiences of their new status, and finally to allow them to express their views as to independence on the basis of their experience.

The "acid test" provided in this bill, S. 3822, is the hardest ever given a nation seeking independence. We submit for your serious consideration this salient fact, that in the election at which they shall decide whether or not they shall be independent the Philippine people will be called upon to say whether they shall sever their connection with the United States at the very hardest period of their reconstruction problems, after having been subjected to the weight of our trade barriers and to the full effect of the constitutional provisions which we impose upon them in the formation of their new government.

AN INSIDIOUS PROPAGANDA

Before passing to a further analysis of the merits of Philippine independence or the ability of the Philippine people to manage their own affairs, your committee desires to call attention to a propaganda intimating that the Philippine leaders are not sincere in their demands for independence. If there is any basis for this intimation, your committee has been unable to locate it.

It is insinuated that the Philippine people do not actually desire independence, and that their leaders do not really favor it, and yet, in reply to this propaganda, there comes from the entire press of the Philippines, from all classes of its population, from its school children and its public officials, from the representatives of its political parties, majority and minority, a demand for independence.

Not a single witness before your committee could name 10 Filipinos who do not favor independence. The business organizations of the islands, their national conferences, their educators, their government officials, their economists have all declared for independence. The Philippine press, the Philippine public, the Philippine pulpit, the Philippine school, and Philippine industries seem, so far as we can ascertain, to be unanimous in the demand that the United States redeem its pledges to grant to these people the sovereignty to which they aspire.

Only a few months ago, the first Philippine independence congress was held in Manila. More than 3,000 delegates from all over the islands, representing the whole people, including the Mohammedan Filipinos, met to deliberate on the question of independence. They discussed the different phases of the Philippine problem with particular reference to the economic consequences and political responsibilities which independence entails. With full knowledge of such consequences and responsibilities, the congress approved resolutions strongly urging independence at an early date.

This unanimity of opinion in the Philippines contrasts strikingly with the differences among colonial Americans. We were not without many prominent tories during the struggles of our patriots for independence.

In the Philippines, however, from the venerable Aguinaldo down to the child in the primary schoolroom, we have not been able to find a Filipino living in his own country who is not in favor of Philippine independence.

In the face of this attitude on the part of 13,000,000 Filipinos, it would seem that they are entitled to a statement from the Congress of the United States as to what their future status shall be.

OPPOSITION OF CERTAIN BUSINESS INTERESTS

As will be seen from the record, your committee has attempted to give to the commercial phases of our contact with the Philippines that consideration which is due those interests in relation to the whole subject, but we have endeavored to arrive at our conclusions on the basis of a broader view than merely trade relationship. It is idle to assume that the interests of manufacturers and others have no bearing upon this issue. It would be equally absurd to argue that the Philippine question should be determined solely from the viewpoint of consideration for the Philippines.

We must not forget American interests and American welfare. But your committee, having obtained all the facts in relation to our trade with the Philippines, finds in this information rather a powerful argument for some immediate disposition of the Philippine question than a reason to decide the matter of Philippine independence from the standpoint of either exporter or importer.

We have before us the data with respect to the importations of raw materials and manufactured products from the Philippines into the United States and we have investigated the exports of America to the Philippine Islands, but we shall not discuss individually these items of trade relationship.

It is pertinent, however, to state that the growing free exchange of products between the islands and the United States, if permitted to go on at the present rate of increase, will tend to develop a commercial relationship strong enough later to submerge every other consideration in the problem of Philippine independence.

When we took over the Philippines in 1898, the islands sent most of their exports (more than one-half) to Europe. In 1900, more than 55 per cent of the total exports of the Philippines went to European countries. From 1900 to 1908, the United States received 32 per cent of Philippine exports. But in 1909, when free-trade relationship was established, the United States received more than 42 per cent of Philippine exports. In 1927, more than 74 per cent of Philippine exports came into the United States. The growing trade relationship is manifest in these figures. It is equally manifest in the fact that 62 per cent of all foreign products consumed in the Philippines are received from the United States. The tariff wall surrounding the Philippines protects American products and manufactures against all competition.

The total trade of the islands in 1928 was approximately $290,000,000. The imports to the islands were approximately $134,000,000; the exports $155,000,000.

In 1928, the island imports from the United States were $84,000,000, and exports to the United States, $115,000,000. Thus about 69 per cent of the foreign trade of the islands was with the United States.

It is evident that if this trade relationship is permitted to continue, increasing the number and strength of commercial ties between the two nations, the time will rapidly come when a change in the status of the Philippines, however desirable it may be from a national, military, or humanitarian standpoint, will mean economic ruin to the Philippines themselves and an unquestionable detriment to Americans.

Your committee therefore believes that instead of resolving the Philippine question on the basis of commerce, the conclusion to be drawn is that the whole problem must be settled as quickly as its importance permits, and this growing relationship between Americans and Filipinos be given a permanent foundation.

As far as the Philippines are concerned, it is with reason they maintain that the disruption of present relationships now will subject them to hardships which they can more readily endure at present than at some future date when their economic dependency will be greater.

In passing, your committee desires to call attention to the fact that there is an organized medium of opposition to Philippine independence in the United States, namely, the Philippine-American Chamber of Commerce of New York. It is composed of American business men having trade relations with the Philippine Islands. The membership list discloses that of its 80 members all but 22 are residents of New York and only two reside in Manila. A fund was raised by this organization to oppose Philippine independence. They circularized the press of the United States and business organizations and Members of Congress. They reached almost the entire press of America by letters and pamphlets prior to the hearings before your committee, when these various bills came under discussion. It is perfectly natural that this propaganda on the part of those with commercial interests has had its effect upon the recipients of this literature.

The attitude of this organized hostility is unfortunate in that it may be misunderstood and may tend to encourage reprisals harmful to American trade. We have in our colonial history signal incidents that revealed the resentment of our own people under similar circumstances. The Filipinos will naturally not be friendly to the "yard of cloth" argument against their national aspirations.

THE AMERICAN FARMERS' INTERESTS

In America there is one element of our national life which is now receiving attention from Congress and which has appealed to Congress to change conditions with respect to the Philippines. The American farmer has an interest in the disposition of this important question.

Representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and other farm organizations appeared before your committee to express their concern in this particular problem and though they did not demand any unduly rigorous action on the part of Congress against the Philippine people whom our Government committed itself to serve, they asked that we give consideration to their interests. They pointed out that in the 1,000-mile stretch of islands in the Philippines there was an area equal to the combined area of the States of New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Vermont.

They pointed out that in this 114,000 square miles of territory there were vast agricultural areas, capable of great development and production, and they significantly reminded the committee that 80 per cent of the imports of products from the Philippine Islands into the United States to-day consists of farm products, while only 20 per cent of the exports of the United States to the Philippines is farm products. Since perhaps not more than one-seventh of the area of the Philippines is developed to-day, these figures give some idea of the extent to which the farmer in America has an interest in the competition from Philippine products.

It may be well to mention at this point that while the agricultural imports from the Philippines are increasing, the United States is at the same time developing irrigation systems with the object of converting to agricultural purposes vast areas of lands in our own western country. All of this new acreage in America is being brought into competition with the farmers who are here to-day. In his present financial condition, the American farmer's interest in Philippine exportations of agricultural products is not to be forgotten or ignored, especially when he is being urged to reduce his acreage and production.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

There appeared before your committee another element in our domestic life, the American Federation of Labor, representing the millions of working men and women of the United States. These representatives of labor called to our attention the matter of Philippine immigration, pointing out that our exclusion laws against certain oriental nations do not apply to the Philippines; that workers from these islands come into America directly or by way of the Hawaiian Islands and elsewhere, and that already there have been disturbances in the United States due to the growing number of Philippine laborers whose hire can be obtained at prices far below the standard wages of American workmen and women.

The average daily wage scale in the islands is from 50 to 75 cents a day for field laborers and for industrial labor an average of $1 a day.

While wages and the standard of living in the islands is from 200 to 300 per cent higher than that obtaining in other oriental countries, it is far below the American standard, which, under the present arrangement, must confront Philippine competition.

The interests of union labor, which for 32 years has been advocating Philippine independence, can not be overlooked in disposing of the Philippine question.

Congress has demonstrated that it will not subject the 13,000,000 Filipinos to the rigors of our exclusion act, to our trade barriers, or to other handicaps placed upon the foreigner while these people are held within the jurisdiction and under the protection of American sovereignty. No foreign nation excludes its colonials from its own domain, nor can America initiate such a policy with propriety.

Again, therefore, considering those questions of economics not related to the Filipinos themselves, but wholly American questions, it is not necessary to decide the Philippine status in favor of one or the other, but it is desirable to solve the Philippine problem for the future in the interest of all these elements of our American life.

While the interests of the American farmer, of the worker, and of the manufacturer should be protected, this protection should come from a constructive settlement of the whole problem from which the complaints arise and not through piecemeal legislation. Such legislation can only result in ill feeling and leave the main cause of the trouble untouched.

We can not, however, blind ourselves to the fact that there is a definite, well-organized movement in America to bring action along the lines of the respective interests affected by the present anomalous conditions. So it would seem to be our duty to take action now on the broader problem, lest at some future date, in emergency or excitement, we might find ourselves applying to these people exclusion laws, tariff barriers, or coastwise shipping restriction which in common justice we should not apply against them while they remain under our flag.

HISTORICAL FACTS

In 1898 when, as a result of the Spanish-American War, we took over the Philippine Islands, we found an unstable government set up under Spanish domination existing under so-called colonial jurisdiction.

Under Article III of the protocol, signed at Washington in August, 1898, we provided:

"The United States will occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines."

The treaty by which Spain ceded to the United States "the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands," was signed at Paris on December 10, 1898. The beginning of civil government in the Philippine Islands under American sovereignty, as distinguished from purely military administration, dated from the appointment by President McKinley in March, 1900, of what is known as the Taft Philippine Commission.

We separated the executive, judicial, and legislative branches. The commission took over the legislative powers. The judicial powers were to be exercised by the courts established through legislative action of the commission, and the authority to exercise the executive powers was continued in the commander of the military forces of the United States. On June 21, 1901, the President issued an order transferring from the military governor to the president of the commission the authority to exercise the executive powers. On July 4, 1901, the late Chief Justice Taft was made civil Governor of the Philippine Islands.

Under the act of July 1, 1902, the existing government was continued and the act placed the seal of legislative approval upon the governmental organization. The Philippine Commission was the sole legislative body for the islands. Section 7 of this act authorized and directed the taking of a census and provided that two years after this census a general election should be held for the choice of delegates to a popular assembly for the islands. The census was taken in 1903 and the Philippine Assembly established in 1907.

In 1916 Congress passed what is known as the Jones law, the present organic act of the Philippine Islands. By this act Congress has given to the Philippines practically all the power that can be granted to them short of complete sovereignty. In accordance with this act, the President of the United States appoints the Governor General, the vice governor, who is also the secretary of public instruction, the chief justice, and the eight associate justices of the supreme court, the auditor, and the deputy auditor.

Congress and the Governor General may review and nullify the acts of the Philippine legislative bodies.

The Philippines have been transformed from an impotent colonial possession, with doubtful efficiency of government, to a people largely handling their own affairs, under the supervision of a few American officials.

POLITICAL CAPACITY

Are the Filipinos ready for self-government; can they maintain a stable self-government?

In the Jones Act previously referred to will be found the following preamble, which is a part of our statutory law, and which has laid down the policy we have pursued in our relations to the islands since 1916, as follows:

"Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers they may be better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence."

It is pertinent to inquire whether under the Jones Act the Philippine people are exercising all of the functions of government with the exception of sovereignty.

In this connection the following must be considered:

The Philippine people elect the Philippine Senate of 22, two members being appointed to represent the non-Christians. They also elect 86 members of the house, 9 being appointed to represent the non-Christian Provinces. This bicameral body enacts the domestic laws for the Philippine people.

There are only three high executive officials in the Philippine Islands who are not Filipinos. One of these is the Governor General, appointed by the President; another is the vice governor, who is secretary of public instruction, and the third is the auditor. The deputy auditor is a Filipino. Of the high judicial officials (the chief justice and eight associates—nine in all) the chief justice and three of the associate justices are Filipinos.

The governors and members of the provincial boards of the 39 regularly organized Provinces, and all members of the legislature from these Provinces, are Filipinos elected by the people.

In the 9 specially organized Provinces, 5 governors are appointed and 4 elected. Of these 9, 6 are Filipinos and 3 Americans.

From the beginning of American occupation the 900 municipal governments of the islands have been administered practically exclusively by elected Filipinos.

According to the report of the director of civil service of the Philippine Islands, there were on December 31, 1928, only 494 Americans in the civil personnel of the Philippine government, while 19,606 Filipinos were permanently employed under the civil service. Of the 494 Americans, 293 were in the teaching service.

There are 30,000 teachers in 8,000 public schools in the Philippines. Of these teachers only 293 are Americans. The schools are scattered throughout the islands.

Out of the 13,000,000 population, there are more than 1,100,000 enrolled in the public schools alone. There are private colleges and universities in the islands. Some of these institutions are as old as our oldest universities.

It is significant that public order in the Philippines is maintained with unusual vigor and success by what is known as the constabulary, or insular police force. This force is composed of 6,331 Filipinos as enlisted men. Of the 398 officers, 375 are Filipinos.

The Wood-Forbes report on this particular subject states that the Filipinos "are naturally an orderly and law-abiding people," and further that "the constabulary has proved itself to be dependable and thoroughly efficient." The Secretary of War testified that "excellent general conditions of order have existed for over 25 years in the Philippines."

Attention is called at this point to the fact that on the entrance of the United States into the World War the Philippines organized a force and offered it to the United States for service.

At the last election more than 1,000,000 Filipinos voted, notwithstanding each voter is required under the Philippine laws to possess certain electoral qualifications. From 80 to 95 per cent of the registered voters actually vote.

In connection with the holding of elections we have at least one noted authority (the Wood-Forbes report) which says:

"Interest in the election was widespread and election day passed without any serious disturbance. There was a general wide acceptance by the minority of the results of the popular vote."

There are only two political parties in the Philippines, the majority and minority parties, whose differences are on domestic problems. They are in agreement as to Philippine independence.

The present government is substantially a popular government. The elected representatives of the people legislate for the whole country. Executive functions are administered through the different departments, at the head of each of which, with the exception of the department of public instruction, is a Filipino secretary. These secretaries are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Philippine Senate after each general election, upon recommendation of the leaders of the party in power, from the members of the party which commands a majority in the legislature. The executive departments function under the direction of the secretaries of departments subject to the power of supervision and control of the Governor General.

FINANCES

The Philippine government has been self-supporting since the establishment of civil government in the islands. The only expenses incurred by the American Government are those in connection with the United States Army stationed in the Philippines. The Philippine government has been and is in a sound financial condition. Its income is in excess of its expenditures for the present necessary activities of the island government.

The Philippines have a stable government currency based on the gold standard. The circulation is about ₱130,000,000.

The net bonded indebtedness of the government at the end of the year 1928 was ₱175,237,000, for which there were accumulated sinking funds amounting to over ₱43,000,000. This indebtedness is below the total debt limit fixed by Congress. Besides, this indebtedness will be reduced during the current year by ₱12,000,000, already set aside by the legislature for the redemption of bonds which are redeemable at the option of the government during this year.

A further analysis of financial operations of the government will be found in the budget for 1930 submitted by the Governor General.

HOMOGENEITY AND CULTURE

Joined with the argument that there is some doubt as to the ability of the Filipinos to manage their own affairs is the frequently asserted statement that there exists a diversity of tribal interests, antagonisms, and prejudices which would militate against the maintenance of a stable government. The facts as given to your committee do not bear out the statement.

The late Chief Justice Taft in 1914, testifying before the Senate, said:

"There is a racial solidarity among them (the Filipinos), undoubtedly. I can not tell the difference between an Ilocano and a Tagalog or a Visayan—to me all Filipinos are alike."

Former Governor General Forbes says:

"Racially the Filipino is a Malay and throughout the islands the bulk of the population is sufficiently similar in type to indicate no great difference in origins."

Testimony indicated that while there are many dialects in the Philippines just as there are in all oriental countries, there are but three basic dialects, the Tagalog, the Ilocano, and the Visayan. There are 3 other important dialects, but the testimony was that it was a simple matter for the people to have a speaking knowledge of 2 or 3 of these dialects.

Moreover, as the result of the teaching of English in the islands for more than 30 years, a great number of the Filipinos, regardless of their groups or their dialects, speak the English language, which is rapidly becoming a common language throughout the islands, especially among the younger generation. English has been the official language of the government for many years.

In one of the Latin American States of South America nearly 100 dialects are spoken, in Mexico there are estimated 59 dialects, and it is hardly necessary in order to negative the contention that language differences are a bar to independence to indicate the numberless dialects of China, which have persisted for thousands of years, and which in that country render the inhabitants on one side of a stream wholly unable to talk with inhabitants on the opposite side of the stream. The old countries of Europe are not free from linguistic differences. In Bulgaria there are Bulgarians, Turks, Rumanians, and Greeks. Three languages are spoken in Switzerland. In Hungary Magyars, Slovaks, and Germans use their respective languages, and in other countries of the world there are similarly diversified peoples of distinct racial stock.

In the Filipino delegation which appeared before your committee several sections of the islands and various groups of the people were represented. Yet they had common media of communication and expression.

By itself the mere differences in language would hardly be a bar to national aspirations for independence.

In connection with the fact that there are 8,000 schools in the Philippine Islands, it is significant to note that in Siam, with a population estimated at 9,000,000, there are 5,600 schools; in Peru, with an estimated population of 6,147,000, there are 3,486 schools; in Venezuela, with a population of 3,029,000, there are 857 schools, excluding special and higher schools and primary schools with an enrollment of 73,000.

Statistics indicate that a minimum estimate of literacy in the Philippines is something above 40 per cent, measured by the American standard. The percentage of illiteracy in Mexico is 62 per cent; in Siam, 79 per cent; in Venezuela, 72 per cent (taking countries at random for this analysis).

The number of pupils in the public schools of the Philippines in 1904 was 227,500. In 1928 there were 1,111,500 enrolled.

In 1930, according to the budget figures, 28 per cent of the total Philippine revenues was set aside for education. The percentage of school children in the public schools in the Philippines, exclusive of private-school children, compared to population, is 9.26 per cent; while in Korea, according to the Japan Yearbook, 1929 (p. 677), it is 2.7 per cent; in the Dutch East Indies it is 3 per cent; and in French Indo-China, 1 per cent (according to the figures of G. Angoulvant in Les Indes Neerlandaises, Vol. I, p. 312).

This report has accepted the percentage of literacy in the Philippines as 40 per cent in order to make its comparison conservative. However, the Philippine census of 1918 (Vol. II, pp. 53, 54, and 58) gives the percentage of literacy as 49.2 per cent in that year. The Philippine representatives claim more than 60 per cent of literacy. They hold that full credit is not given to those who are literate in certain dialects, and that sufficient allowance is not made for the increased school facilities and larger annual expenditures for education since 1918.

CAPACITY TO MAINTAIN INDEPENDENT GOVERNMENT

Your committee desires to discuss particularly one frequently made statement, namely, "that the existence or nonexistence of adequate preparation for complete independence can be established with finality only by an actual test."

So long as the United States exercises that supervision, control, and authority over the affairs of the Philippine Government under the present organic act, a categorical decision as to the Filipino people's capacity or incapacity for independent government can not be made. It is argued, therefore, that to grant such a test would "involve an advance decision" with respect to the "very question for the ultimate determination" of which the test would prove a guide.

But such is not the case, as is evidenced by the provisions of the bill S. 3822. Under the provisions of this bill the United States is to furnish the machinery for the setting up of a government and the application of certain conditions precedent to independence which will give the Philippine people the test desired without relinquishing at once the sovereignty of the United States over the islands. These people will determine for themselves subsequently to the test whether they still desire independence and during the period of the test the United States remains in that control necessary to determine for itself whether it wishes to proceed with its approval of what the island government is or is not doing. It controls the veto, if necessary, to the island's legislative enactments. There is no other way to test that capacity.

But whatever may have been our Government's influence in the matter, the fact is that noted authorities have complimented the Philippine governmental agencies upon their efficiency and capacity and have commented as well upon the widespread participation of the people in the elections held in connection with governmental functions. Nor was there any evidence further than that cited to indicate that permanent stable government is or will be menaced by racial or tribal differences. The witnesses before your committee, whatever their views as to what should be done with the Philippines, did not criticize the manner in which the Philippine Government is being managed by Filipinos, and some were high in their praise of both the efficiency and intelligence manifested by those in charge of Philippine domestic affairs.

President Wilson, in connection with the maintenance of a stable government in the Philippines, said:

"Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands.

"I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and duty to keep our promise to the people of these islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

Under the present system of government the Filipinos have assumed and exercised the essential functions of administration subject only to the reserved power of the Governor General. The valuable experience acquired by the Filipinos under their present government should fully capacitate them to discharge the functions which will devolve upon them under the new government provided for in this bill.

Governor General Stimson in his report for 1928, after detailing the work of the Philippine Legislature, said:

"The record of legislation produced was highly creditable."

In addition to demonstrating their capacity to administer the affairs of government we are not without evidence that the Philippine people have acquired a reasonable degree of appreciation of the Anglo-Saxon concept of individual rights. Even before the operation of American influence on the islands there was set up by the people in their own constitution for the Philippine republic a guaranty of individual rights. Thirty years of the application of the American bill of rights can not but have had a salutary influence in furthering these concepts.

THE JUDICIARY

The judiciary is well organized and efficient and testimony was that there is "a wide-awake public opinion and an ever-vigilant bar maintained with healthy interest in the courts, which is the best guaranty of a sound and impartial judiciary."

There are 28 district judges in the islands and 25 auxiliary judges. In addition thereto there are 865 justices of the peace. All but two of the judges of the courts of first instance are Filipinos.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND SANITATION

We shall not in this report detail the extensive work which has gone on in the islands in the way of bettering sanitary conditions, extending roads and highways, and in general promoting all those necessary municipal or State efforts which go with the development of a people.

There are in the record much data covering these varied activities. There is much work to be done for the realization of health and sanitation programs, but progress has been made. Except for one short period, cholera, malaria, and smallpox have not been serious in later years. Maternity work is conducted under the public welfare commission. Sewer and water systems are being established. A department of hygiene in the university trains men for sanitation work. Health habits are taught in the schools. But with all this there is room for improvement.

The average annual death rate is set at 20 per 1,000 inhabitants and is smaller than in any of the other oriental countries.

COMMUNICATIONS

As to public roads, the statement of a Governor General is: "There are more miles of improved roads in the islands to-day—I know what it is in Luzon—than in the whole continent of South America outside the cities; and that is true all through the archipelago." (October, 1929.)

There are three trunk railroad systems, at 19,000 kilometers of first-class roads.

There is a system of postal communication and interisland shapping communication.

THE MORO

There is substantial or convincing testimony to the effect that in the island of Mindanao, in Sulu, and in Palawan, where the Moro population centers, there is a combined population of 1,175,212, but that this part of the archipelago is not inhabited wholly by Mohammedan Filipinos or Moros, and that there are living in this area of 44,700 square miles 536,726 Christians and 205,000 Pagans.

The testimony also is to the effect that the Moros number 423,200, or but 4 per cent of the population of the islands, and occupy only 21 per cent of the land area of the islands where they are found and only 8 per cent of the archipelago as a whole.

It is further testified that these Moros belong to the same racial blended stock as do other Filipinos, the Malays; that they are sending their children to the public schools of the islands; that they pay their taxes; and that they unite in the demand for Philippine independence.

The adoption by the Moros in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries of the Mohammedan religion resulted in a diversity between them and the other Filipinos in certain characteristics, customs, and traditions. There is similar diversity of customs in certain of the other groups and there is some difference in the matter of religion. It would hardly be fair, however, to set up as a bar to independence the theory that our release of the Philippines would endanger the Christian religion in the islands, since the Christian religion was established in the islands for more than 300 years prior to our occupation of them, and 91 per cent of the population is Christian.

THE ORIENTAL PROBLEM

The question of Philippine independence in its relation to the Orient in general has been investigated; but as the result of such inquiry, no fundamental reason is found for refusing independence to the Filipino people because of correlated oriental problems.

We attach hereto as a part of this report the 3-party agreement or treaty which limits our fortification of the islands as a matter of defense. In the absence of fortifications precluded by this treaty, no naval or army authority will deny that the Philippine Islands could not be held against a strong enemy for any reasonable length of time.

To attempt to fortify the Philippines for defense, if we hold them for the future, would require a change in the treaty which now regulates our military and naval operations in the Pacific. There is serious doubt as to their utility to us in the event of armed conflict. They probably would be a liability so long as the 3-power treaty is operative.

It was asserted at the hearings that a foreign nation would hesitate to engage this country in conflict at the present time because of the ultimate disaster which such a war would mean to such aggressor. But admitting that no foreign power at the present time has any designs upon these islands or any desire to take them, there is still a possibility that they may involve us in disputes with a foreign power.

In their present state of preparedness the Philippine Islands would be useless as a post of defense. The Army personnel in the islands at present is limited to some 4,000 Regular Army men and to some 6,400 Philippine Scouts. There is also limited equipment.

These islands, once they were captured, it is generally agreed, could hardly be retaken by us for at least two years, and then only at the cost of an immense amount of money in war expenditures and after the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives of American sailors and soldiers. These islands lie within 30 hours' sailing from the Asiatic coast, they are practically part of Asia, as much so, in fact, as Cuba is a part of the American continent, and that they are 21 days' sailing, by the fastest ships, removed from the Pacific coast of the United States.

The 3-party treaty with Japan was a far-reaching decision and leaves the Philippine Islands, so far as the Army and Navy of the United States are concerned, in an unprotected condition which can not be changed while this treaty remains in effect.

The only possible expansion of military preparedness in the islands would be that effectuated in the mobile military forces of the islands. But to extend the mobile military force to the point of adequate defense would require from 60,000 to 80,000 trained men, or a body nearly as large as the standing Army of the United States.

EFFECT OF INDEPENDENCE IN ORIENT

Keen interest is evoked by one theory advanced at the hearings; namely, that to grant Philippine independence might disturb the peace of the Orient by inspiring in other peoples there a desire to free themselves from European control. It is asserted that the granting of independence to the Philippines will stimulate a desire for independence on the part of these other dependencies. To give weight to such a theory would be to recognize an unsound philosophy or policy repugnant to the very best traditions of our Nation. We are proud that our experiment in self-government has been imitated by all the nations in South America and by many of the nations of Europe. The finest pages of our history are those recording the conflicts that have followed our own departure from colonial dependency.

We entered the Orient as the protectors of a downtrodden people and later assumed to guide them to the level of occidental civilization. That occidental civilization finds its highest expression in national independence.

At this date of our supremacy over the Philippines, 30 years after our occupation of the islands, to assert that our granting their freedom would be unwise because of the stimulus it would give to other nations cherishing like hopes, is to validate a theory which will have but little weight with real Americans.

We can hardly justify a course which began with the object of establishing a democracy in the Orient and which is to end in colonial control.

As will be verified by current events, there are eastern colonies now endeavoring to assert their aspiration for national identity and moving toward independence, wholly without regard to our attitude in the matter of the Philippine Islands. Our presence in the Orient in these instances has not deterred desires for national self-expression.

Furthermore, our treatment and disposition of the Philippine Islands will largely be the measure by which the Orient will weigh our international honesty. We are told that our retention of the Philippine Islands has a beneficial effect on our intercourse and trade with the Orient. But there is no evidence to conclude that a continuation of our sovereignty over the Philippines will be conducive to oriental friendship. If the Philippine people, actuated by the statements of our executives and by the promises and pledges made in our statutory law, demand, as they do, their independence, and we deny them that independence, it is not likely that our attitude will present a favorable aspect in the Orient.

As time goes on and we retain the Philippine Islands in complete sovereignty, it is scarcely probable that the oriental conception will credit us with those altruistic principles in which we take great national pride. The result may reverse what the advocates of retention now call our strategic position for trade in the Orient.

The holding of the Philippines for mere trade advantage in the Orient seems one-sided in its application, for the reason that while the Philippines offer to the United States a development of foreign trade, the status in which the Philippines find themselves is not conducive to the development of their own foreign trade. It must be recalled that while their trade with the United States increases, their markets in the Orient are narrowed.

INDEPENDENCE THE GOAL OF AMERICAN POLICY

The treaties and laws incident to our occupation of the Philippines did not provide for the ultimate freedom of the Philippines. But to-day, it would seem hardly necessary, after all the discussion that has been had on this subject, to offer proof that we have promised to these people their ultimate sovereignty.

The preamble of the Jones Act passed by Congress is a specific pledge that we are preparing the Philippines for independence. Following is the language of the preamble to that act:

"Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

"Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein."

But in addition to this act, Presidents Taft, Roosevelt, and Wilson have at various times made statements indicative of a similar policy. President Harding commended "the Philippine aspirations to independence and to complete self-sovereignty." President Roosevelt declared in a message to Congress in 1908: "I trust that within a generation the time will arrive when the Filipinos can decide for themselves whether it is well for them to become independent."

The "generation" suggested by President Roosevelt, will have passed when independence, under this bill, will have been granted. The new 30-year advocates now seek postponement for another generation.

When the late Chief Justice Taft was Secretary of War in 1904, he said:

"When they [the Philippine people] have learned the principle of successful popular self-government from a gradually enlarged experience therein, we can discuss the question whether independence is what they desire, and grant it * * *."

In the instructions of President McKinley to the first Philippine commission, he expressed the hope that the Philippine people would receive its members as bearers of "the richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation."

Again President McKinley said:

"The Philippines are ours not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government."

In 1913, President Wilson, in a message to the Philippine people, said:

"Every step we take will be taken with a view to the ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence."

And in a message to Congress in the same year, he declared:

"We must hold steadily in view their ultimate independence and we must move toward the time of independence as steadily as the way can be clear and the foundations thoughtfully and permanently laid."

If there be any doubt left that the ultimate purpose of the United States in its legislation with respect to the islands has been to prepare them for independence, it should be removed by the fact that in the 30 years in which we have held the Philippines we have not attempted to incorporate them.

By the operation of our own laws we have set up what must be a temporary government in that we have continued the administration of certain of the affairs of the Philippines in the War Department. We have left the general supervision of the Philippine government to the War Department. We have provided that the Governor General report annually to some official designated by the President of the United States, and that official is not the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of State, but the Secretary of War. The plain implication is that our tenure of the Philippines is temporary in character.

There are some who attempt to ignore the formal commitment and promise of independence to the Filipino people in the Jones Act. They attempt to persuade the Congress not only that this declaration is of no binding force, legal or moral, but go so far as to assert that no promise of independence or commitment to that policy has ever been authoritatively declared.

The mere fact that such declaration of policy was made in the preamble of the act and not in the body of the act itself does not in any way lessen its validity. Whether a part of the law or not, the declaration constitutes a definition of national policy formally made by the only authority possessed of the power to make such declaration. The debate which took place in both Houses of Congress on the Jones Act reveals the importance which was accorded by the Congress to this enunciation of national purpose. It was considered by all those who participated in its enactment as the most important part of the act. The wording of the title of the act indicates that such declaration was its most important aim. The contention that this declaration of policy is of no binding force because any subsequent Congress can repeal or alter it is hardly persuasive. While the declaration remains unaltered and unchanged, every reason of national honor compels its fulfillment.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

We will not in this report discuss the constitutionality of an act of Congress withdrawing sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. This point is greatly overemphasized by certain interests and the attack on the right of Congress to alienate the Philippines comes exclusively from those opposed to independence.

In the records of the present session of Congress and in the hearings before your committee there are able, carefully prepared, and comprehensive briefs sustaining the constitutionality of such an act of Congress.

One may be found in the hearings on page 32. Another on page 2698 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29; another on page 2799 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 30.

Furthermore, the office of the Attorney General of the United States in 1924 stated that Congress had the power to grant complete independence to the Philippines, and Justice Malcolm, of the Supreme Court of the Philippines, is of the same opinion.

The opinion of the Attorney General's office may be found in the House hearings of 1924, Philippine Local Autonomy, page 57, and Judge Malcolm's view in the Constitutional Laws of the Philippine Islands (second edition, Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Co., 1926, p. 173).

Professor Willoughby, in the Constitutional Law of the United States (Vol. I, p. 425), reaches the same conclusions as the other authorities cited.

CONSEQUENCES OF WITHDRAWAL

It is urged that while the governmental machinery of the Philippines is practically all in the hands of Filipinos, a great influence is exerted by the American Government through the power of veto in the Governor General and in Congress, and through the supervision by American officials who are holding certain important positions.

The loss of this guiding influence would undoubtedly be of consequence to the Philippine people. There is little doubt that the reins of government could not be shifted to Philippine officials without some disturbing effects. There would be, in the event of our withdrawal, certain increases in the cost of government to the Philippine Islands. There would be, for instance, the cost of consular service and maintenance of diplomatic machinery. There would be the cost of coast and geodetic survey and perhaps an increase in the cost of maintaining insular police. The application of our trade barriers would result in some diminution of income to the Philippines, but such diminution would largely depend upon the methods pursued by the Filipino government in the development of markets elsewhere than in the United States.

Those who are in control of Philippine affairs in the islands today, however, are keenly alive to all these possibilities as are Americans. The testimony indicates that the Philippine leaders have weighed in dollars and cents each of the costs of independence. The significant and logical argument with which they reply, however, is that the future will not relieve them of this responsibility of reconstruction but will, on the contrary, aggravate the difficulties of reconstruction.

The next 15, 20, or 30 years will bring about conditions in the Philippines under which the separation of the islands from the United States would be attended by even more serious consequences to the Philippine people and to the United States than could possibly result from independence at this time.

This is not an American thought on the subject of separation. It is the frankly admitted statement of the Filipinos. The difficulty of reconstruction for the Filipinos was not conceived first by Americans but was long since carefully examined and recognized by the Filipinos themselves.

To permit a readjustment with the least attendant difficulties the bill provides for a 5-year period before the final withdrawal of American sovereignty.

It is urged that the Philippines would also find difficulty in their future financial operations. The Philippine representatives are thoroughly conversant with the conditions which will probably have to be met in the financing of future island developments. But the Filipinos feel that in all such financing, if the relationship of the islands with the United States is friendly, the handicaps of such financing will be largely diminished. And they point to smaller republics in financing through friendly relations with America as indicative of the soundness of their views on this subject.

As to the future stability of the bonds now outstanding against the Philippine Islands, there are many ways in which payment could be guaranteed to the bondholders. It is hardly necessary here to discuss such problems of finance as may be met through refunding or outright assumption which may be agreed upon.

Another handicap to Philippine stability is presented in the fear that there may be in the Orient certain overcrowded nations who would populate the sparsely settled rich territory of the Philippines with an influx of alien population. The bill contemplates adequate provision for writing into the laws of the Philippines their own immigration laws to protect them from such invasion. The passage of such laws and their enforcement, it would seem, would take care of this situation.

CONCLUSIONS

From the foregoing the following conclusions may be drawn:

(1) That it is the policy of the American Government to free rather than retain the Philippines.

(2) That the Philippine people are justified in their plea for independence at this time.

(3) That the Philippine people have made remarkable strides in the path of self-government.

(4) That at the present time the Philippine people are conducting, except in a few instances, the affairs of government.

(5) That the Philippine people are keenly alive to the untoward eventualities of independence.

(6) That the Philippine people, realizing serious hardships may result from independence and from the loosening of the ties that now bind them to American sovereignty, prefer to risk these hardships at the present time, when they are confident of their ability to endure them, than at a remote date when the hazards of separation from the American Government would be so great as either to threaten disaster or to preclude their independence.

(7) That, so far as the interests of Americans are concerned in Philippine trade, it will be more simple to grant independence at an early date than when their interests have a deeper and more far-reaching contact with the Philippines.

(8) That at the present time the conditions existing in the Philippines and the uncertainty of the future status of these islands is operating to dwarf their initiative, handicap their agricultural and industrial development, hamper their efforts to obtain investments of foreign capital, and militate against their enjoying the full possibilities of their economic development.

(9) That there are important elements, both American and Philippine, whose interests demand some action on the part of Congress in the settlement of this national uncertainty.

(10) That the action of the American Government in relation to the Philippines will determine America's prestige in the Orient.

(11) That the Philippine Islands, of doubtful advantage at the present from a purely trade standpoint, have little or no utility in times of war and might even become a burden and a threat to us in the event of our embroilment with certain powers.

(12) That proposals to postpone the date for the granting of Philippine independence for any great number of years will result in the expansion of certain economic ties which may ultimately make impossible the granting of independence.

(13) That no selfish motives of commercial advantage or expansion should interfere with the redemption of our pledges to these people.

(14) That the Philippine people are unanimous in their demand for early and complete independence.

The United States owes a solemn duty to the Philippine people—the duty of an honest declaration of our future intent. If we have decided to retain these islands under some form of colonial government, we should be frank enough to proclaim it. We should not further encourage national aspirations to ultimate independence on the part of the Philippine people if we are ourselves opposed to their independence.

If the delay of independence for 30 years is for the purpose of defeating independence, we should say so frankly.

In submitting this report, it seems proper to make grateful acknowledgment that in the preparation of this bill and of this report, Senator BRONSON CUTTING, of New Mexico, has given his very active assistance and cooperation, and his helpful advice and suggestions have been incorporated in both the bill and the report.

On the basis of the evidence before your committee, and for the purposes of carrying out the conclusions of your committee, the bill, which is herewith given in its entirety, is approved and recommended for passage:

[S. 3822, Seventy-first Congress, second session]

(1) Every duly adopted amendment to the constitution of the Philippine Islands shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. (2) The President of the United States shall have authority to suspend the taking effect of or the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the Philippine Islands which in his opinion seems likely to result in a failure of the government of the Philippine Islands to fulfill its contracts, or to meet its bonded indebtedness and interest thereon, or to provide for its sinking funds, or which seems likely to impair the reserves for the protection of the currency of the Philippine Islands, or may create international complications. The President shall, in any such case, finally determine whether or not such law, contract, or Executive order shall go into or remain in effect.

(3) The chief executive of the Philippine Islands shall make an annual report to the President and Congress of the United States of the proceedings and operations of the government of the Philippine Islands and shall make such other reports as the President or Congress may request.

He shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be lawfully delegated to him from time to time by the President.

The first United States high commissioner appointed under this act shall take office upon the inauguration of the new government of the Philippine Islands. He shall be paid by the United States an annual salary of $18,000 and $12,000 for expenses.

(5) The government of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the selection of a Resident Commissioner to the United States, who shall hold office for a term of four years beginning with the 4th day of March following his selection, and who shall be entitled to an official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of credentials signed by the chief executive of said islands. He shall have a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, with the right of debate, but without the right of voting. His salary and expenses shall be fixed and paid by the government of the Philippine Islands. Until a Resident Commissioner is selected and qualified under this section, existing law governing the appointment of Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall continue in effect.

(5) That the government of the Philippine Islands, on becoming independent of the United States, will assume all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States.

(6) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions (except paragraph (3)) in a permanent treaty with the United States.

(c) If a majority of the votes cast are against Philippine independence, the chief executive of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the Congress of the United States for their action regarding the future political status of the Philippine Islands. In the event of such vote against Philippine independence, after the expiration of the fifth year after the termination of the existing Philippine government all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands or coming into the Philippine Islands from the United States, shall be admitted in accordance with the law in force at the time of [such termination] the passage of this act.

NOTIFICATION TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 8. Upon the proclamation and recognition of the independence of the Philippine Islands under their constitution, the President shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof and invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

APPENDIX

The language of Article XIX of Chapter I of a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, entered into at the city of Washington, D. C., the 13th day of December, 1921, and ratified March 24, 1922, follows. (It will be noted that the contracting powers, in Article XIX are the United States, Great Britain, and Japan.)

"ARTICLE XIX

"The United States, the British Empire, and Japan agree that the status quo at the time of the signing of the present treaty, with regard to fortifications and naval bases, shall be maintained in their respective territories and possessions specified hereunder:

"(1) The insular possessions which the United States now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of the United States, Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, not including the Aleutian Islands, and (b) the Hawaiian Islands;

"(2) Hong Kong and the insular possessions, which the British Empire now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, east of the meridian of 110 east longitude, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of Canada, (b) the Commonwealth of Australia and its territories, and (c) New Zealand.

"(3) The following insular territories and possessions of Japan in the Pacific Ocean, to wit: The Kurile Islands, the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Loochoo Islands, Formosa, and the Pescadores and any insular territories or possessions in the Pacific Ocean which Japan may hereafter acquire.

"The maintenance of the status quo under the foregoing provisions implies that no new fortifications or naval bases shall be established in the territories and possessions specified, that no measures shall be taken to increase the existing naval facilities for the repair and maintenance of naval forces, and that no increase shall be made in the coast defenses of the territories and possessions above specified. This restriction, however, does not preclude such repair and replacement of worn-out weapons and equipment as is customary in naval and military establishments in time of peace."

Report of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, favorably reporting the bill, S. 3377, providing for independence to the Philippine Islands:

REPORT (TO ACCOMPANY S. 3377)

Your Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to whom were referred a number of bills providing for Philippine independence, having considered all such bills, favorably report S. 3377, with an amendment, and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

UNCERTAINTY

For a generation the Philippine problem has confronted the American people. It involves American-Philippine political and economic relations, and the fulfillment of our promise of independence. This bill provides sound, feasible, and fair methods of substituting a definite policy for one of evasion and indecision.

Virtually every witness who testified at the extended hearings conducted by the committee has expressed the view that the present uncertainty characterizing our relations with the Philippine Islands should be removed. Further delay threatens to be prejudicial to the best interests of both the United States and the Philippine Islands.

FAR EASTERN SITUATION

The present situation in the Orient should not prevent Congress from taking definite action at this time. Unsettled conditions in the Far East may continue indefinitely; they may be settled at any time. But the varying fortunes of conflicting forces on the other side of the Pacific can not justly be set up by us as an excuse for delaying the solution of our own problems.

The fulfillment of our duty toward the Philippines must be determined upon the basis of the welfare of the people of the United States and the 13,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands. To change at this time a long-established national policy because of conditions for which we are not responsible and over which we have no immediate control will be interpreted as timidity or weakness.

FACTORS RECONCILED

The recommended bill harmonizes previous divergent views of different groups likely to be affected by Philippine independence. The American farmer, speaking through the three national farm federations, and the dairy organizations, is seeking protection from Philippine competition in our markets. The American workingman, through the American Federation of Labor, and organizations on the Pacific coast, and the American Legion, is demanding the exclusion of Filipino immigrants as well as protection from duty-free Philippine articles produced at lower labor costs.

Nor can the rights and interests of the Filipino justly be ignored. He, too, is under the American flag, and that not by his own choice but by our own will and purpose. While he remains under our sovereignty, he should not be discriminated against. It would be politically immoral to retain indefinitely the Filipino people in their present status as wards and at the same time impose upon them discriminating and unfair restrictions and inhibitions.

We have also to consider our promise to grant independence to the Filipino people. By the declaration of our political parties, by the utterances of our Presidents, by an enactment of Congress, we have pledged our word as a Nation that they should at some time be free and independent. This we can not evade.

INDEPENDENCE—"WHEN" AND "HOW"

Only two questions require decision—first, "When shall the Philippines be granted independence?" and, second, "How should it be granted, so as to protect both Philippine and American welfare?"

To achieve these purposes the bill in the main provides—

PHILIPPINE AUTONOMY

1. The Philippine people shall adopt a constitution for the government of the "Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," pending complete independence. Under that government they will enjoy complete autonomy as to domestic affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations specified in the bill that safeguard both the sovereignty and responsibilities of the United States.

TRADE LIMITATION

2. Pending final withdrawal of American sovereignty, free importations of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits, based upon the status quo as represented by estimated importations from existing investments.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS

3. Pending independence, Philippine immigration to the United States is limited to a maximum annual quota of 100.

COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

4. At the end of a 15-year period from the date of inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, the people of the islands shall, at a plebiscite, vote on the question of independence, and if a majority favor independence the President is directed to recognize and declare the independence of the Philippine Islands, whereupon, for all purposes, they will become to the United States a foreign nation.

These provisions establish a process for the independence of the Philippine people and the adjustment in an orderly manner of our economic and other relations with them. They provide the erection of the new Philippine national structure and at the same time a safe and satisfactory transition from the present dependent to the future independent status.

GRADUAL TRADE ADJUSTMENT

Twenty-five years ago free-trade relations were established between the United States and the Philippine Islands. This was done by the American Congress against the expressed desire and despite the opposition of the people of the islands. As a consequence of free trade, Philippine industries and trade with the United States have developed on that basis.

This arrangement resulted in an artificial stimulation in the production of certain articles and manufactures in the Philippines, and an extraordinary increase in the volume of American-Philippine trade with a corresponding decrease in the trade of the islands with foreign countries.

Obviously the existing free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippines can not be terminated abruptly without serious injury to Philippine economic interests and American trade with the islands. Both require a definite time to prepare for the change. Investments made on the basis of free trade must be given sufficient time for adjustment or liquidation without loss. Philippine industries must be given time to establish themselves on a competitive basis before they are placed outside the tariff walls of the United States.

MORAL OBLIGATION

The United States owes a moral obligation to the Filipino people in this respect. The existence of this obligation can not be too strongly urged. We can not justify an act which might result in the destruction of the economic structure that we helped to build in the Philippines, with the consequent lowering of standards of living.

Orderly transfers of sovereignty have usually been accompanied by such provisions as those proposed in this bill. When the Philippines were ceded to the United States by Spain we agreed by treaty to permit Spain for 10 years to send her merchandise and her ships to the Philippines on the same basis as ours. We did this because we realized that we would injure Philippine and Spanish interests if we abruptly forced on the Philippine Islands a different arrangement.

A DEFINITE PERIOD

The committee examined the various proposals as to the time at which independence should be granted. There were proposals for immediate independence, for independence in 5 years, for independence in 10 years, and for independence in 20 years. The reasons urged in behalf of each were considered. Your committee concluded that a period of 15 years was required for the necessary readjustments. Some members of the committee yielded their preference for earlier independence on the basis of evidence developed at the hearings. There was unanimous agreement that a definite date for independence should be set.

During the first 10 years of the 15-year period there is to be a limitation on importations from the Philippines to the United States as already indicated.

GRADUATED TARIFF

At the end of the first 10 years there begins a gradually increasing tariff levy in the nature of an export tax imposed and collected by the Philippine government on all Philippine free exports to the United States. From the eleventh to the fifteenth year the tax will rise from 5 per cent to 25 per cent of the American tariff on like articles imported from foreign countries. Products on the general free list of the American tariff will not under the bill be subject to this tax.

Three main considerations dictated this procedure. First, to permit Philippine industries to adjust themselves to the new conditions following independence; second, to induce the Filipino people to diversify their products on a competitive basis and to find new markets for them; third, to protect American agriculture, labor, and industry.

PAYMENT OF BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

One additional reason prompted this provision. It will permit the Philippine Islands to discharge its bonded indebtedness prior to independence, for the bill requires that all collections from this tax shall constitute a special fund to be used exclusively for the retirement of the outstanding indebtedness of the Philippine Islands. It is believed that at the end of the 15-year period the bonded indebtedness of the islands will have been paid.

UNITED STATES SOVEREIGNTY UNIMPAIRED

The sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands during the 15-year period continues unimpaired. The United States also retains such authority in the government of the Philippine Islands as is commensurate with its responsibilities. But it is in the nature of reserved powers and authority rather than of actual and affirmative participation in the government. The authority can be exercised when the necessity for it arises. Additional power is unnecessary. These powers extend to the safeguarding of the finances of the Philippine nation, its currency, its foreign trade, its public lands and mines, public order, and all those activities and services of the government necessary for the protection of life, liberty, and property. It is also provided that foreign relations of the islands shall be exclusively under the control and supervision of the United States, and that our Government at any time may intervene to prevent a violation of international obligations.

RECOGNITION OF AMERICAN AUTHORITY

Pending the consummation of independence United States sovereignty will be represented in the Philippines by a high commissioner, who shall be recognized as such representative by all the departments of the Philippine government.

The high commissioner will act as the representative of the United States, and he is vested with all of the prestige and authority required for the discharge of such responsibility. He shall have access to all of the records of the government and have means at his disposal to acquaint himself with the manner in which the government of the Commonwealth is conducted.

Should any of the eventualities described in the bill, involving either the finances or the orderly functioning of the government, occur, the way is clear for the exercise of authority by the United States to remedy such conditions.

The governmental powers reserved to the United States and the United States high commissioner are effective to insure an efficient administration of public affairs in the Philippines.

MILITARY AND NAVAL BASES

Under the provisions of this bill the United States also reserves the right to retain its present military, naval, and other reservations in the Philippine Islands. It is also provided that after independence, the United States may obtain, by lease or purchase, any additional territory in the Philippine Islands as it may consider necessary for such purposes. There is no provision in the bill to prevent the withdrawal or abandonment of these naval and military posts at any time, or at the end of the 15-year period. That question is left to future decision and determination.

The bill provides that after the people of the Philippine Islands have voted for independence, and prior to the final withdrawal of American sovereignty, a conference of representatives of the American and Philippine Governments shall be held for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands.

CONCLUSION

The recognized policy of the United States in the Philippines has been to prepare the Philippine people for independence. Every Chief Executive since our occupation of the islands down to the present time has stated that we were in the islands for the purpose of assistance rather than colonization. Every legislative act of Congress has contemplated ultimate independence. For 30 years every act of the American Government in the islands has been based upon and in furtherance of this policy.

We have done much for these people. Americans may justly say that we have accomplished for the Filipino people in 30 years what no other nation has done for the people of its colonies in a hundred years. And the Philippine people appreciate that fact, and they are grateful to America for it.

The rest they must do and achieve by themselves. And they can only have this opportunity if, as this bill provides, they are permitted to lead their own life, enjoying their independence, free to exercise their own genius, and thrown on their own resources.

Every condition precedent that we have imposed upon them has been fulfilled. They now have a stable government. We can no longer postpone a definite solution of the question of independence without serious injustice. The Filipino people unitedly are respectfully, but with insistence, urging their independence. Further delay will not be understood by them and can not be justified by us.

The bill, as amended, is as follows:

S. 3377

A bill to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

CONVENTION TO FRAME CONSTITUTION FOR PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

SECTION 1. The Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, which shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives in the capital of the Philippine Islands, at such time as the Philippine Legislature may fix, to formulate and draft a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, subject to the conditions and qualifications prescribed in this act, which shall exercise jurisdiction over all the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 10th day of December, 1898, the boundaries of which are set forth in Article III of said treaty, together with those islands embraced in the treaty between Spain and the United States concluded at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900. SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 3. Upon the drafting and approval of the constitution by the constitutional convention in the Philippine Islands, the constitution shall be submitted to the President of the United States, who shall determine whether or not it conforms with the provisions of this act. If the President finds that the proposed constitution conforms substantially with the provisions of this act he shall so certify to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, who shall so advise the constitutional convention. If the President finds that the constitution does not conform with the provisions of this act he shall so advise the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, stating wherein in his judgment the constitution does not so conform and submitting provisions which will in his judgment make the constitution so conform. The Governor General shall in turn submit such message to the constitutional convention for further action by them pursuant to the same procedure hereinbefore defined, until the President and the constitutional convention are in agreement.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO FILIPINO PEOPLE

SEC. 4. After the President of the United States has certified that the constitution conforms with the provisions of this act, it shall be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held within four months after the date of such certification, on a date to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature, at which election the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall have an opportunity to vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and ordinances appended thereto. Such election shall be held in such manner as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which the return of the election shall be made. The Philippine Legislature shall by law provide for the canvassing of the return and, if a majority of the votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, shall certify the result to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, together with a statement of the votes cast thereon and a copy of said constitution and ordinances. The Governor General shall, in that event, within 30 days after receipt of the certification from the Philippine Legislature, issue a proclamation for the election of officers of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands provided for in the constitution. The election shall take place not earlier than three months nor later than six months after the proclamation by the Governor General ordering such election. When the election of the officers provided for under the constitution has been held and the results determined, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall certify the results of the election to the President of the United States, who shall thereupon issue a proclamation announcing the results of the election, and upon the issuance of such proclamation by the President the existing Philippine government shall terminate and the new government shall enter upon its rights, privileges, powers, and duties, as provided under the constitution. The present government of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the orderly transfer of the functions of government.

If a majority of the votes cast are against the constitution, the existing government of the Philippine Islands shall continue without regard to the provisions of this act.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY AND RIGHTS TO PHILIPPINE COMMONWEALTH

SEC. 5. All the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaties mentioned in the first section of this act, except such land or other property as has heretofore been designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States, and except such land or other property or rights or interests therein as may have been sold or otherwise disposed of in accordance with law, are hereby granted to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands when constituted.

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES PENDING COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 6. After the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands trade relations between the United States and the new government shall be as now provided by law, subject to the following exceptions:

(a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all refined sugars in excess of 50,000 long tons, and on unrefined sugars in excess of 800,000 long tons, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(b) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(c) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all yarn, twine, cord, cordage, rope, and cable, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila (abaca) or other hard fibers, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of a collective total of 3,000,000 pounds of all such articles hereinbefore enumerated, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(d) In the event that in any year the limit in the case of any article which may be exported to the United States free of duty shall be reached by the Philippine Islands, the amount or quantity of such articles produced or manufactured in the Philippine Islands thereafter that may be so exported to the United States free of duty shall be allocated, under export permits issued by the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, to the producers or manufacturers of such articles proportionately on the basis of their exportation to the United States in the preceding year, except that in the case of unrefined sugar the amount thereof to be exported annually to the United States free of duty shall be allocated to the sugar-producing mills of the islands proportionately on the basis of their production in the preceding year, and the amount of sugar which may be exported from each mill shall be allocated between the mill and the planters on the basis of the proportion of sugar received by the planters and the mill from the planters' cane, as provided in their milling contract. The government of the Philippine Islands is authorized to adopt the necessary laws and regulations for putting into effect the allocation hereinbefore provided.

(e) The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall impose and collect an export tax on all articles that may be exported to the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of existing law as modified by the foregoing provisions of this section, including the articles enumerated in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c), within the limitations therein specified, as follows:

(1) During the eleventh year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 5 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(2) During the twelfth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 10 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(3) During the thirteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 15 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(4) During the fourteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 20 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(5) After the expiration of the fourteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 25 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall place all funds received from such export taxes in a sinking fund, and such fund shall, in addition to other moneys available for that purpose, be applied solely to the payment of the principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities, until such indebtedness has been fully discharged.

When used in this section in a geographical sense, the term "United States" includes all Territories and possessions of the United States, except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam.

SEC. 7. Until the final and complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands—

(1) Every duly adopted amendment to the constitution of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. If the President approves the amendment or if the President fails to disapprove such amendment within six months from the time of its submission, the amendment shall take effect as a part of such constitution.

(2) The President of the United States shall have authority to suspend the taking effect of or the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands which in his judgment will result in a failure of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands to fulfill its contracts or to meet its bonded indebtedness and interest thereon or to provide for its sinking funds, or which seems likely to impair the reserves for the protection of the currency of the Philippine Islands, or which in his judgment will violate international obligations of the United States.

(3) The chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall make an annual report to the President and Congress of the United States of the proceedings and operations of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall make such other reports as the President or Congress may request.

(4) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a United States high commissioner to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands who shall hold office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is appointed and qualified. He shall be known as the United States high commissioner to the Philippine Islands. He shall be the representative of the President of the United States in the Philippine Islands and shall be recognized as such by the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, by the commanding officers of the military forces of the United States, and by all civil officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands. He shall have access to all records of the government or any subdivision thereof, and shall be furnished by the Chief Executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands with such information as he shall request.

If the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands fails to pay any of its bonded or other indebtedness or the interest thereon when due or to fulfill any of its contracts, the United States high commissioner shall immediately report the facts to the President, who may thereupon direct the high commissioner to take over the customs offices and administration of the same, administer the same, and apply such part of the revenue received therefrom as may be necessary for the payment of such overdue indebtedness or for the fulfillment of such contracts. The United States high commissioner shall annually, and at such other times as the President may require, render an official report to the President and Congress of the United States. He shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be lawfully delegated to him from time to time by the President.

The United States high commissioner shall receive the same compensation as is now received by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and shall have such staff and assistants as the President may deem advisable and as may be appropriated for by Congress. He may occupy the official residence and offices now occupied by the Governor General. The salaries and expenses of the high commissioner and his staff and assistants shall be paid by the United States.

The first United States high commissioner appointed under this act shall take office upon the inauguration of the new government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

(5) The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the selection of a Resident Commissioner to the United States, and shall fix his term of office. He shall be the representative of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall be entitled to official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of credentials signed by the chief executive of said government. He shall have a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, with the right of debate, but without the right of voting. His salary and expenses shall be fixed and paid by the government of the Philippine Islands. Until a Resident Commissioner is selected and qualified under this section, existing law governing the appointment of Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall continue in effect.

SEC. 8. (a) After the date of the inauguration of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands—

(1) For the purposes of the immigration act of 1917, the immigration act of 1924 (except section 13 (c)), this section, and all other laws of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens, citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall be considered as if they were aliens. For such purposes the Philippine Islands shall be considered as a separate country and shall have for each fiscal year a quota of 100. This paragraph shall not apply to a person coming or seeking to come to the Territory of Hawaii who does not apply for and secure an immigration or passport visa.

(2) Citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall not be admitted to the continental United States from the Territory of Hawaii (whether entering such Territory before or after the effective date of this section) unless they belong to a class declared to be nonimmigrants by section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 or to a class declared to be nonquota immigrants under the provisions of section 4 of such act other than subdivision (c) thereof, or unless they were admitted to such Territory under an immigration visa. The Secretary of Labor shall by regulations provide a method for such exclusion and for the admission of such excepted classes.

(3) Any Foreign Service officer may be assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands, under a commission as a consular officer, for such period as may be necessary and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, during which assignment such officer shall be considered as stationed in a foreign country; but his powers and duties shall be confined to the performance of such of the official acts and notarial and other services, which such officer might properly perform in respect of the administration of the immigration laws if assigned to a foreign country as a consular officer, as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

(4) For the purposes of sections 18 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917, as amended, the Philippine Islands shall be considered to be a foreign country.

(b) The provisions of this section are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws, not inapplicable, shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this section. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this section, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this section.

(c) Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this section, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act.

SEC. 9. (a) At any time after the expiration of the fifteenth year and before the expiration of the seventeenth year after the inauguration of the government provided for in this act the people of the Philippine Islands shall vote on the question of Philippine independence. The Legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the time and manner of an election for such purpose, at which the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall be entitled to vote.

(b) If a majority of the votes cast are in favor of Philippine independence, the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the President of the United States, who shall, within 60 days after the receipt of such report, issue a proclamation announcing the results of such election, and within a period of two years after such report the President of the United States shall withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty then existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippine Islands, and, on behalf of the United States, shall recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof, under the constitution then in force: Provided, That the constitution has been previously amended to include the following provisions:

(1) That the property rights of the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be promptly adjusted and settled, and that all existing property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States shall be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded to the same extent as property rights of citizens of the Philippine Islands.

(2) That the government of the Philippine Islands will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States not later than two years after his proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippine Islands.

(3) That the officials elected and serving under the constitution adopted pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be constitutional officers of the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands and qualified to function in all respects as if elected directly under such government, and shall serve their full terms of office as prescribed in the constitution.

(4) That the debts and liabilities of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, cities, municipalities, and instrumentalities, which shall be valid and subsisting at the time of the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States, shall be assumed by the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands; and that where bonds have been issued under authority of an act of Congress of the United States by the Philippine Islands, or any Province, city, or municipality therein, the Philippine government will make adequate provision for the necessary funds for the payment of interest and principal, and such obligations shall be a first lien on the taxes collected in the Philippine Islands.

(5) That the government of the Philippine Islands, on becoming independent of the United States, will assume all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States.

(6) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions (except paragraph (3)) in a treaty with the United States.

(c) If a majority of the votes cast are against Philippine independence, the chief executive of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the Congress of the United States for their action regarding the future political status of the Philippine Islands: Provided, That until Congress otherwise provides the Philippine Islands shall revert to the status established by this act for the first 10 years after the inauguration of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

NOTIFICATION TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 11. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries: Provided, That within six months after the people of the Philippine Islands have voted on the question of Philippine independence, if a majority of the votes cast are in favor of independence there shall be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, such representatives to be appointed by the President of the United States and the chief executive of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, respectively, for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States; but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

CERTAIN STATUTES CONTINUED IN FORCE

SEC. 12. Except as in this act otherwise provided, the laws now or hereafter in force in the Philippine Islands shall continue in force in the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands or by the Congress of the United States, and all references in such laws to the Philippines or Philippine Islands shall be construed to mean the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be deemed successor to the present government of the Philippine Islands and of all the rights and obligations thereof. Except as otherwise provided in this act, all laws or parts of laws relating to the present government of the Philippine Islands and its administration are hereby repealed as of the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

Report of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, favorably reporting the bill H. R. 7233, at this session of the Congress.

Your Committee on Insular Affairs, to whom were referred several bills looking to the independence of the Philippine Islands, having considered the same, favorably report H. R. 7233, with an amendment, and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

BASIC FACTS

A careful analysis of the Philippine question and of all the evidence submitted at the hearings held before the committee discloses the following facts:

1. When the United States, as a result of the war with Spain, assumed sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, it disclaimed any intention to colonize or exploit them.

2. In pursuance of such lofty purpose the United States, through Executive pronouncements and a formal declaration made by the Congress in 1916, pledged itself to grant independence to the Philippines. The only condition precedent imposed by the Congress was the establishment of a stable government.

3. It is believed that a stable government now exists in the Philippines; that is, a government capable of maintaining order, administering justice, performing international obligations, and supported by the suffrages of the people.

4. Every step taken by the United States since the inception of American sovereignty over the Philippines has been to prepare the Filipino people for independence. As a result they are now ready for independence politically, socially, and economically.

5. The American farmer is urging protection from the unrestricted free entry of competitive Philippine products.

6. American labor is seeking protection from unrestricted immigration of Filipino laborers, especially at this time of widespread unemployment.

7. The solution of the Philippine problem can no longer be postponed, without injustice to the Filipino people and serious injury to our own interests.

8. Any plan for Philippine independence must provide for a satisfactory adjustment of economic conditions and relationships. The present free-trade reciprocity between the United States and the Philippines was established by the American Congress against the opposition of the Filipino people. The major industries of the islands have been built on the basis of that arrangement. This trade arrangement can not be terminated abruptly without injuring both American and Philippine economic interests.

Your committee held extended hearings at which the representatives of the various groups concerned appeared. Every person who asked to be heard was accorded an opportunity to testify.

AMERICAN POLICY PROMISE OF INDEPENDENCE

There is little need for argument to justify the grant of independence to the people of the Philippines. We stand committed to the duty of making them free. At the very outset of our occupation of the islands (in 1898) President McKinley proclaimed the purpose of their acquisition and forecast their destiny. "The Philippines are ours," he said, "not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us."

Still later, at a time when the American people had heard a year's discussion of our intentions and plans regarding the islands, President McKinley voiced the hope that the first Philippine commission would be accepted by the Filipinos as bearers of "the richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation."

In January, 1908, President Roosevelt said in his message to Congress:

"* * * The Filipino people, through their officials, are therefore making real steps in the direction of self-government. I hope and believe that these steps mark the beginning of a course which will continue till the Filipinos become fit to decide for themselves whether they desire to be an independent nation * * *."

In 1913 President Wilson, in a message to the Filipino people, said:

"We regard ourselves as trustees acting not for the advantage of the United States but for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands. Every step we take will be taken with a view to ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence."

Similar statements of our Government's intent to help the Filipinos achieve separate, independent nationhood are to be found in official utterances of the Presidents of the United States from 1898 to the present.

In 1916 the Congress of the United States, in the preamble of the Jones Act, declared:

"Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

"Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

"Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence."

Nearly 16 years have passed since the enactment of this act. More than 10 years have elapsed since President Wilson certified to the Congress that the condition precedent for the granting of independence has been fulfilled.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Filipino people are the beneficiaries of several centuries of civilization. Long before the Spanish conquest of the islands in the latter half of the sixteenth century, the inhabitants possessed a certain degree of culture, including written languages, characteristic arts, and industries. They maintained commerce with the mainland of Asia. This civilization and culture were, like the people themselves, of Malay origin, but with Indonesian and Mongolian elements.

Spanish occupation of the islands for more than three centuries introduced and established Christianity, European jurisprudence, language, and customs. It centralized authority and tended thereby to unify the country. However, economic progress during the first two centuries of Spain's dominion was slow. The spread of democracy in Europe and America in the late decades of the eighteenth and the early years of the nineteenth century—largely as a result of the American Revolution—influenced the fortunes and the outlook of the Filipinos. From 1807 to 1872—a stretch of 65 years—there were 11 native revolts against Spanish rule. These testify to the sense of nationalism and the longing for self-government of the Filipino people.

The interval from 1872 to 1896—24 years—was a period of preparation for the more decisive struggles of later years. In 1896 Jose Rizal, the leading Filipino patriot, was executed. Soon afterwards the Katipunan, a revolutionary association, with Andres Bonifacio at its head, started a nation-wide revolt.

The outcome was a solemn agreement binding the Spanish authorities to institute reforms, among them improvements in the judicial system, Filipino representation in the Spanish Cortes at Madrid, separation of church and state, and in general a larger measure of autonomy for the islands. This agreement included a stipulation that Aguinaldo and other leaders should expatriate themselves.

The Spaniards failed to execute the agreement they had made. In consequence, the Filipinos, under the leadership of Gen. Francisco Macabulos, renewed the revolt and established a provisional government. In April, 1898, when the United States declared war, the Filipinos were in active rebellion against Spain. At the suggestion of Admiral Dewey, in May, 1898, Aguinaldo, who was then in Hong Kong, returned to Manila as an ally of the Americans. With the aid of the American military authorities he succeeded in wresting the islands, with the exception of Manila, from the Spanish forces. Manila itself was captured on August 13, 1898, upon the arrival of the American Army.

From the occupation of Manila until more than a year after the treaty of Paris had transferred the islands to the United States, the government there was purely military. For nine months—September 1, 1900, to June, 1901—the islands were governed by the Taft Commission and the United States Army. The commission exercised legislative powers, but the executive authority was lodged in the military. This arrangement was supplanted in June, 1901, by civil government when William Howard Taft, president of the commission, was inaugurated as the first civil governor. The establishment of civil government throughout the islands was delayed because of native resistance to American control, which started with the outbreak of hostilities between Filipino forces and the American Army on February 4, 1899.

PROGRESS IN SELF-GOVERNMENT

In 1901 the Filipinos were given control of municipal governments. Beginning in 1903 the people of the Provinces were permitted to elect the provincial governors. At first the two members, who with the governor constituted the provincial board, were appointive officials, but they, too, were soon made elective. In 1907, under the provisions of the Cooper Act, the first elective assembly was inaugurated. The legislature was then composed of this elective assembly as its lower house and a commission appointed by the President of the United States as the upper house, whose presiding officer was the Governor General. The share of the Filipino people in the government was still further enlarged in 1913, when a majority of Filipinos was appointed to the commission. This, for practical purposes, gave the Filipinos control of the legislature.

Under the Jones law, passed in 1916, the Philippine people were given a very large and important participation in their government. To a great measure the government of the islands was placed in their hands. This active, responsible part in making and administering their laws and in conducting their other public affairs has been for them a practical apprenticeship in self-government.

The act provided for an elective senate and house of representatives as the legislative department of the insular government. The Governor General ceased to be the presiding officer of the upper house but continued as the chief executive official. Though the Governor General is the chief executive official, the executive departments perform all executive functions. The secretaries of these departments are all, with the exception of the vice governor, Filipinos, appointed by the Governor General upon the recommendation of the party in power in the legislature, and confirmed by the Philippine Senate. The vice governor is secretary of the department of public instruction.

A notably useful institution is the council of state, created some 14 years ago. Members of the council are chosen by the Governor General. Thus far the secretaries of the various departments, and the presiding officers and the majority leaders of the two houses of the legislature have constituted its membership, under the chairmanship of the Governor General. The council acts in an advisory capacity and has served to reconcile divergent views of the executive and the legislature with reference to fundamental questions of policy. Governors General have recorded their indebtedness to the council of state for its helpful cooperation.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND ELECTIONS

Political parties are not merely organs for the expression of hopes, proposals, and demands with respect to government; they are also measures of the popular capacity to understand and differentiate political, economic, and moral issues. Still more are they a test of people's fitness for self-government if they stand for the sanctity of the ballot and insure full acquiescence in the will of the majority honestly and unmistakably expressed.

There are at present but two political parties in the Philippines. They have existed for a good many years—one of them dates from 1907. They differ as to principles and policies of government, but they are at one on the question of independence. Their contests for victory at the polls have at times been marked by warmth and vigor, but the elections have always been orderly. The Wood-Forbes report, quoted at the hearings, described the elections of 1919 as "without any serious disturbance," and declared that there was a "general acceptance by the minority of the result of the popular vote." This finding of the Wood-Forbes Commission is true of other elections.

At the last general elections (1931) there were 1,009,125 voters registered. Of these 983,406 (about 90 per cent) cast their ballots. At no election, the testimony showed, has the proportion of voters to registrations been less than 80 or 85 per cent. These statistical facts illustrate the popular interest in the insular elections and in the issues at stake.

At present there is only male suffrage in the islands and this is limited to certain classes. A male 21 years of age, who is able to read and write Spanish, English, or any of the native dialects; or who owns property of an assessed value of 500 pesos or more; or who pays an annual tax of at least 30 pesos; or who held one of the so-called municipal offices during the Spanish dominion is entitled to vote. There is now a movement to enfranchise Filipino women, and a bill granting them suffrage is pending in the Philippine Senate, having already passed the house. This proposal to add women to the electorate is taken as additional evidence of the people's appreciation of their civic duties and responsibilities.

POPULAR EDUCATION

Popular education is everywhere and always a stimulus and assistance to popular interest and participation in government. The Filipino people, as evidence submitted to the committee attested, are eager for education and willing to expend large sums on their schools of every level. In September, 1929, there were 9,063 schools in the islands, an increase of approximately 7,000 schools since we obtained possession of the islands. Of these, 8,442 were public schools. Enrolled in these schools, public and private, were 1,316,126 students. The public schools are staffed by 28,519 supervisors, principals, and teachers, all but about 300 of whom are Filipinos. The annual expenditure for public education in the Philippines for 1932 will represent almost 30 per cent of the government's income. The whole cost of this public education is paid by the people of the islands.

Included in this great educational establishment, public and private, are four universities of high academic standard. One of these, that of Santo Tomas, in Manila, was founded in 1611, or 25 years before Harvard University. Some 19,500 young men and young women are preparing themselves at these universities for the professions. Many others are attending the normal schools for the teaching profession. Many Filipinos are also attending colleges and universities in America and other countries. In all the schools of the islands, primary, secondary, and higher, the language of instruction is English.

HEALTH AND SANITATION

Many agencies and institutions, both preventive and curative, are at work to combat disease and promote health among the Filipino people. Sanitation was one of the first concerns of the American Government in the Philippines. Progress in this regard has been steady in all parts of the islands. For the last 15 years the health service has been administered almost wholly by Filipinos. The present director of the bureau is a Filipino, as are nearly all of his 522 medical and 2,083 lay assistants. In 1930 there were 105 hospitals of all types in the islands. One of them (in Manila) was founded in 1596 and is the oldest institution of its kind in the Far East.

The Secretary of War in 1930 reported that "Health conditions were in general good."

As a proof and a measure of the effectiveness of the work accomplished for health and sanitation, official statistics for the year 1930 were adduced in testimony on this subject. They showed the birth rate to be 38.65 per 1,000, and the mortality to be 22.78 per 1,000. The success of the Philippine Health Service in treating and eradicating leprosy has attracted widespread attention. The leprosarium at Culion has been visited by medical scientists of many countries and is one of the leading institutions of its kind. Here again, as in the case of education and other activities of the government, the cost is paid by the Filipino people.

CIVIL SERVICE

In the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the insular establishment proper, in the Provincial and municipal offices, including Manila and Baguio, there were on December 31, 1930, some 21,700 civil service employees. All but 461 of these were Filipinos. Of the Americans remaining in the service, nearly all are teachers. In the office of the Governor General there are 35 Filipino civil employees.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Interesting and significant facts regarding the administration of justice in the islands were presented in oral testimony and in official statistics received by the committee. The judicial system of the islands includes a supreme court, 28 courts of first instance in as many different districts, and 865 justices of the peace. There are one or more judges for each of the 28 district courts. Thirty-one auxiliary judges assist these district judges. All the justices of the peace and all the district judges save two are Filipinos. Until 1913 the judges of the supreme court numbered 9, 5 Americans and 4 Filipinos.

The Philippine attorney general's report for 1930 gives the information that the courts of first instance disposed of a total of 14,265 civil cases and 6,823 criminal cases in that year. Of the criminal cases, 5,888 resulted in convictions and 935 in dismissals.

Breaches of the law in the Philippines, the testimony indicated, are relatively few. About 7,000 convictions for violations of statutes and municipal ordinances are recorded each year. The number of persons confined in prisons is about 8,000.

PUBLIC ORDER

Law and order are maintained throughout the islands by the Philippine constabulary and the local police forces. The constabulary is an organization of 7,000 members, practically all of whom are Filipinos, and is supported exclusively by the insular government. It is efficient and reliable. The Wood-Forbes commission, in its report to the President in 1922, said:

They (the Filipinos) are naturally an orderly law-abiding people. The constabulary has proved itself to be dependable and thoroughly efficient.

INSULAR CURRENCY

The soundness of Philippine currency was persuasively demonstrated at the hearings. On December 31, 1930, the total net circulation of insular currency was ₱108,000,000. The several forms of this currency and the amount of each were: Treasury certificates, ₱71,000,000; Philippine silver coin, ₱20,000,000; bank notes, ₱16,000,000. By way of guaranty for this circulation there was as of October 31, 1931, a gold-standard fund of ₱38,000,000 divided thus: ₱10,000,000 in Philippine currency and ₱7,000,000 in United States currency deposited in the Philippine treasury, and ₱20,000,000 in gold currency in several Federal reserve banks in the United States.

The law of 1903 requires that the gold-standard fund shall be at all times not less than 15 per cent nor more than 25 per cent of the total or available circulation of Philippine currency. The ₱38,000,000 gold standard reserve is therefore ₱16,000,000 in excess of the legal requirement on the basis of actual circulation.

The treasury certificates in circulation on December 31, 1930, were backed, more than dollar for dollar, by a reserve taking the form of American currency and held in Federal reserve banks in the United States. On the date given this reserve was ₱81,000,000—that is, ₱10,000,000 larger than the aggregate of treasury certificates. In addition to this reserve, there are ₱13,000,000 in the treasury of the Philippine Islands behind these certificates. Of this sum, ₱3,700,000 is in American currency, the rest in Philippine silver coins.

It was pointed out that the operation of the act of 1903 requiring these protective reserves behind the Philippine currency makes it one of the most dependable currencies in the world to-day. While there is no provision for gold reserves in the islands, an equivalent is supplied by the backing of gold currency in the United States. The stability of the Philippine currency is thus made as safe and stable as American currency. The fact that despite the present depression Philippine currency remains at par with the American gold dollar is evidence of its soundness.

The financial administration of the Philippines is directed by Filipinos.

NATIONAL WEALTH AND TRADE

The Secretary of War reports that in 1930 the trade of the Philippines with the United States and foreign countries aggregated ₱512,520,162, a decrease of about 17.8 per cent from that of 1929. The insular collector of customs, in his report, gives the value of imports as ₱266,334,255. The balance of trade in favor of the islands was ₱20,148,348. The bulk of the overseas trade was with the United States. The total of this was ₱367,050,179 and its proportion of the entire foreign commerce of the islands 72 per cent. Of the whole volume of trade with the United States ₱156,366,057 represents imports and ₱210,684,122 exports. The balance in favor of the islands, accordingly, was ₱54,318,065.

Since 1909, when free trade with the United States was established, the insular trade with the United States has risen from ₱10,576,682, equal to 16 per cent of their entire foreign commerce, to ₱367,050,179, or 72 per cent in 1930.

Sugar, coconut oil, cordage, and tobacco were the principal exports to the United States and these have been growing steadily in volume. They come to the United States duty free.

It is natural that the domestic industries and foreign commerce of the islands should enlarge in keeping with the increase in population. There were only 4,500,000 Filipinos in 1866 and about 7,500,000 in 1898. The Philippines are rich in many products which the world needs. The national wealth is estimated at ₱5,905,085,000 (1927), or ₱478 per capita. If independence be bestowed on them, the Filipino people will begin their separate existence with a greater patrimony than was possessed by many of the peoples who recently have joined the ranks of sovereign nations.

INSULAR BUDGET

At a time of universal depression, when most nations, large and small, are beset with fiscal difficulties, the government of the Philippines is in a sound financial condition. This statement is corroborated by the report of the insular auditor. From the exhibits left with the committee it appears that the Philippines not only have succeeded in balancing their budget but have in fact accumulated a surplus. Even in 1932, and in the face of curtailment of revenues, the Philippine budget will be balanced without increased taxation or abandonment of essential government services. The budgetary system was adopted in the Philippine Islands before it became operative here.

It was urged by the proponents of independence in the presentation of their views to the committee that this wise stewardship of the insular revenues evidences the ability of the Filipinos to manage one of the most difficult departments of government in one of the worst financial dislocations of recent years.

THE NATIONAL DEBT

The present outstanding bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands is ₱170,000,000, as against which there has already been built up a sinking fund of ₱50,000,000, now on deposit in American banks. This leaves a net outstanding indebtedness of ₱120,000,000. The present national debt is but 48 per cent of the bonded-debt limit fixed by the Congress of the United States and the evidence submitted at the hearings showed that the Philippine government is regularly meeting both interest and the required amortization of said bonds.

In his annual report for 1930, the Secretary of War said:

"The total amount of outstanding indebtedness is well within the limits provided by law and sinking funds are fully maintained to cover all outstanding bonds."

FILIPINO IMMIGRATION

Filipino immigration into the United States is at present unrestricted. From several points of view it is a matter of no little concern. It involves economic and other difficulties for this country, especially in the States of the Pacific coast. According to the census of 1930 there are 45,208 Filipinos in the United States. About 35,000 of these are in the Pacific States. It is complained that these Filipinos compete with American workers and thereby contribute to the lowering of the American standard of wages and living. Spokesmen for the Filipino people in their statements to the committee contended that while the Philippine Islands remain under the American flag their native inhabitants ought not to be excluded from this country. They, however, freely conceded the right of the United States to exclude them after independence. Nation-wide unemployment faces us with exigencies that obscure the equities of the question. Many Americans, as we learned at the hearings, regard independence, aside from the ethical considerations which warrant it, as the cure for the evils of Filipino immigrants and urged it on those grounds.

THE SO-CALLED MORO PROBLEM

Ninety-two per cent of the approximately 13,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are Christians. Four per cent are pagans and 4 per cent Mohammedans. These Mohammedans are the so-called Moros. The Mohammedan, the pagan, and the Christian Filipinos are racially identical. Their history and tradition are the same. The Mohammedan and pagan Filipinos have for a long time acquiesced in the government of the islands by the Christian majority, and their most important leaders have publicly given adhesion to the cause of independence. In the revolution against Spain, it was pointed out, non-Christian Filipinos united with Christian Filipinos to overthrow Spanish authority.

There is no substantial evidence that these Moros and others have protested against Christian preponderance in the government. The contention that the United States is obligated by a treaty with the Moros to see to it that they should not be governed by Christians was negatived by the statements of W. Cameron Forbes, former Governor General and member of the Wood-Forbes Commission; Frank W. Carpenter, former governor of Mindanao and Sulu; and General Pershing, under whose supervision the Moros were disarmed. Finally, the committee were informed that one of the Moro datus, Facundo Mandi, had recently led a public manifestation of Mohammedan Filipinos in behalf of independence at Zamboanga. A resolution favoring complete and absolute independence, it was testified, had been drafted by the manifestants and transmitted to the President of the United States. A resolution favoring independence for the Philippines, bearing the signatures of some 1,500 Filipinos from the Mohammedan sections of the islands, also was submitted to the committee.

INDECISIVENESS DETRIMENTAL TO BOTH PEOPLES

To protract the present indecisive status of the Philippine Islands, your committee believe, would be to prejudice not only the welfare of the Filipinos but also American interests, especially those of agriculture and labor. The Philippines, though under the sovereignty of the United States, are for certain purposes foreign territory. Our Constitution does not apply to them. The Filipinos are not American citizens. Any sudden change in our trade relations with them would injure them, yet for reasons entirely our own we might at any time revise these relations. No large investments of outside capital are likely to be made in the Philippines while their future remains as doubtful as it now is. The insular government can provide no reasonable assurance of stability of conditions under which manufacturing, commerce, or other activities shall be undertaken there, because of the power of Congress to alter them irrespective of the wishes or the welfare of the Filipino people.

FEASIBLE PLAN FOR INDEPENDENCE

In keeping with the principles which have guided our dealings with the Filipino people these last thirty-odd years we should proceed to liberation in an orderly manner, through an institutional process which will not only provide for the erection of the new national structure but will also insure the safe and satisfactory adjustment of all present political and economic relations of the two Nations.

Any plan for independence should afford a reasonable time for the readjustment of existent trade relations. The backbone of Philippine economic system is the present reciprocal free trade with the United States. Abrupt termination of that relationship would destroy many of the basic industries of the Philippines; it would seriously imperil the future of the free Philippine nation and forfeit much of the gains the people have made under the guidance of the United States. This free-trade reciprocity was not of the Filipino people's seeking. It was enacted by the American Congress against their wishes. Once in effect, free trade stimulated the production of those commodities that are protected in the American market. It was responsible also for an extraordinary increase in the volume of Philippine-American trade and in a considerable decrease in the trade of the islands with other countries. Obviously a sudden disruption of this relationship will injure both American and Philippine economic interests.

We can not justify the termination of this relationship without allowing the interests concerned an opportunity to prepare themselves to meet the new conditions which will obtain after independence, when the Philippine Islands will have been placed outside the tariff wall of the United States. More particularly we owe a duty to Philippine industries which have been built up on the basis of free trade and to the people who depend for their livelihood on such industries. It is our duty to give them an opportunity to place themselves on a competitive basis before a radical change is forced upon them.

But while we are thus solicitous for the welfare of the Filipino people, we can not ignore our duty to the American farmer and the American wage earner. The organizations representing American agriculture plead for protection from free Philippine imports that compete with like products of our own soil. American workers, too, call for the exclusion of Filipino immigrants.

NECESSITY FOR DEFINITE ACTION

This review of the facts and issues enfolded in the present relationship of the Philippines with the United States serves to illustrate the gravity of the problem and to underline the need for a prompt and permanent solution. There should be no further delay. Our self-interest and our self-respect coincide in demanding action.

Our purpose in the Philippines has been accomplished. The unity of the people there is a fact. Their readiness and their eagerness for self-government have been abundantly demonstrated. Their financial capacity to support their government is beyond question. They have a balanced budget, a stable currency, a sound and efficient administration of justice, a successful system of public instruction. They have sanitation, communications, and all other services which are indispensable to progressive and orderly government. They maintain law and order through their own instrumentalities and assure protection to their own citizens and the nationals of other countries. Their educational and economic standards are higher than those in other countries in that part of the world. Under our inspiration and tutoring they have come to understand and prize and covet democracy. They recognize their debt of gratitude to the American people.

We have done for the Filipinos all that we have promised them except to grant them independence. We owe it not only to the Filipino people but also to our own to name the day and the way of Philippine independence.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

On the basis of these facts and considerations, the duty of the United States to grant independence to the Philippine Islands is clear. The only questions to be considered are: First, When should independence be granted? and, second, What should be the terms of the grant? To solve these questions the present bill is recommended. It provides a sound, feasible, and orderly process of granting independence under conditions which shall be just and fair at once to American and Filipino interests.

The salient provisions of the bill are as follows:

1. The Filipino people are authorized to adopt a constitution and institute the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands which will exist pending complete independence. Under such government they will enjoy complete autonomy as to domestic affairs, subject only to certain reservations intended to safeguard both the sovereignty and the responsibilities of the United States.

2. Pending final relinquishment of American sovereignty the free importation of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits based upon the status quo as represented by estimated importations from existing investments.

3. Pending independence, Philippine immigration to the United States is limited to a maximum annual quota of 50.

4. On the 4th of July immediately following the expiration of a period of eight years from the date of the inauguration of the government of the Philippine commonwealth American sovereignty will be withdrawn and the complete independence of the Philippine Islands formally recognized. Thereupon the Philippines, to all intents and purposes, will become a country foreign to the United States.

5. The United States reserves the right and privilege, at its discretion, to retain and maintain military and naval bases and other reservations in the Philippine Islands.

The bill as amended is as follows:

[H. R. 7233, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

A bill to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

Such election shall be held in such manner as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which the return of the election shall be made. TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES PENDING COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 6. After the date of the inauguration of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands trade relations between the United States and the new government shall be as now provided by law, subject to the following exceptions:

(1) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all refined sugars in excess of 50,000 long tons, and on unrefined sugars in excess of 800,000 long tons, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(2) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(3) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all yarn, twines, cords, cordage, rope, and cables, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila (abaca) or other hard fibers, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of a collective total of 3,000,000 pounds of all such articles hereinbefore enumerated, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(4) In the event that in any year the limit in the case of any article which may be exported to the United States free of duty shall be reached by the Philippine Islands, the amount or quantity of such articles produced in the Philippine Islands thereafter that may be so exported to the United States shall be allocated under export permits issued by the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, to the producers or manufacturers of such articles proportionately on the basis of their exportation to the United States in the preceding year; except that in the case of unrefined sugar the amount thereof to be exported annually to the United States free of duty shall be allocated to the sugar-producing mills of the islands proportionately on the basis of their production in the preceding year, and the amount of sugar which may be exported from each mill shall be allocated between the mill and the planters on the basis of the proportion of sugar received by the planters and the mill from the planters cane, as provided in their milling contract. The government of the Philippine Islands is authorized to adopt the necessary laws and regulations for putting into effect the allocation hereinbefore provided.

When used in this section in a geographical sense, the term "United States" includes all Territories and possessions of the United States, except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the Island of Guam.

SEC. 7. Until the final and complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands—

(1) Every duly adopted amendment to the constitution of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. If the President approves the amendment, or if the President fails to disapprove such amendment within six months from the time of its submission, the amendment shall take effect as a part of such constitution.

(2) The President of the United States shall have authority to suspend the taking effect of or the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, which in his judgment will result in a failure of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands to fulfill its contract, or to meet its bonded indebtedness and interest thereon or to provide for its sinking funds, or which seems likely to impair the reserves for the protection of the currency of the Philippine Islands, or which in his judgment will violate international obligations of the United States.

(3) The chief executive of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall make an annual report to tne President and Congress of the United States of the proceedings and operations of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall make such other reports as the President or Congress may request.

(4) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a United States high commissioner to the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands who shall hold office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is appointed and qualified. He shall be known as the United States high commissioner to the Philippine Islands. He shall be the representative of the President of the United States in the Philippine Islands and shall be recognized as such by the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, by the commanding officers of the military forces of the United States, and by all civil officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands. He shall have access to all records of the government or any subdivision thereof, and shall be furnished by the chief executive of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands with such information as he shall request.

If the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands fails to pay any of its bonded or other indebtedness or the interest thereon when due or to fulfill any of its contracts, the United States high commissioner shall immediately report the facts to the President, who may thereupon direct the high commissioner to take over the customs offices and administration of the same, administer the same, and apply such part of the revenue received therefrom as may be necessary for the payment of such overdue indebtedness or for the fulfillment of such contracts. The United States high commissioner shall annually, and at such other times as the President may require, render an official report to the President and Congress of the United States. He shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be lawfully delegated to him from time to time by the President.

The United States high commissioner shall receive the same compensation as is now received by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and shall have such staff and assistants as the President may deem advisable and as may be appropriated for by Congress. He may occupy the official residence and offices now occupied by the Governor General. The salaries and expenses of the high commissioner and his staff and assistants shall be paid by the United States.

The first United States high commissioner appointed under this act shall take office upon the inauguration of the new government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

(5) The government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the selection of a resident commissioner to the United States, and shall fix his term of office. He shall be the representative of the government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall be entitled to official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of credentials signed by the chief executive of said islands. He shall have a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, with the right of debate, but without the right of voting. His salary and expenses shall be fixed and paid by the government of the Philippine Islands. Until a resident commissioner is selected and qualified under this section, existing law governing the appointment of Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall continue in effect.

(a) For the purposes of the immigration act of 1917, the immigration act of 1924 (except section 13(c)), this section, and other laws of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens, persons who are citizens of the Philippine Islands, and who are not citizens of the United States, shall be considered as if they were aliens. For such purposes the Philippine Islands shall be considered as if it were a separate country and shall have for each fiscal year a quota of fifty. This subdivision shall not apply to a person coming or seeking to come to the Territory of Hawaii who does not apply for and secure an immigration or passport visa.

(b) Citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall not be admitted to the continental United States from the Territory of Hawaii (whether entering such Territory before or after the effective date of this section) unless they belong to a class declared to be nonimmigrants by section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 or to a class declared to be nonquota immigrants under the provisions of section 4 of such act other than subdivision (c) thereof, or unless they were admitted to such Territory under an immigration visa. The Secretary of Labor shall by regulations provide a method for such exclusion and for the admission of such excepted classes.

(c) Any Foreign Service officer may be assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands under a commission as a consular officer, for such period as may be necessary and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, during which assignment such officers shall be considered as stationed in a foreign country; but his powers and duties shall be confined to the performance of such of the official acts and notarial and other services which such officer might properly perform in respect to the administration of the immigration laws if assigned to a foreign country as a consular officer, as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

(d) For the purposes of sections 18 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917, as amended, the Philippine Islands shall be considered a foreign country.

(e) The provisions of this section are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws, not inapplicable, shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this section. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this section, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this section.

(f) Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this section, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act.

(g) This section shall take effect 60 days after the enactment of this act.

(6) That the government of the Philippine Islands, on becoming independent of the United States, will assume all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States.

(7) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions (except paragraph (3)) in a treaty with the United States.

Tables showing the financial condition of the Philippine government, as reported by the insular auditor for the year 1930, show that at the end of the year 1930 the Philippine government had a surplus of ₱12,687,325.15. I might add that the surplus at the end of the year 1931, was ₱3,572,347, exclusive of a cash fund of ₱6,500,000 used for advances for money orders.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT AS REPORTED BY THE INSULAR AUDITOR FOR THE YEAR 1930

Summary of financial status: The financial condition of the central government on December 31, 1930, as compared with that of the preceding year, is shown in the consolidated balance sheet on page 19 of this report, and summarized as follows:

	Dec. 31, 1930	Dec. 31, 1929	Increase (+), decrease (−), in 1930
Total assets	₱1,254,282,627.03½	₱784,093,279.04½	+470,189,347.99
Total liabilities	1,052,243,134.31	599,732,941.36	+452,510,192.95
Total surplus at the end of the year	202,039,492.72½	184,360,337.68½	+17,679,155.04

SURPLUS

The excess of the total assets over the total liabilities constitutes the total surplus or net worth of the central government as at December 31. This total surplus is segregated in the consolidated balance sheet into current and invested surplus, which are subdivided as follows:

	Dec. 31, 1930	Dec. 31, 1929	Dec. 31, 1928	Increase (+), decrease (−), in 1930	Increase (+), decrease (−), in 1929	Difference between increase and decrease, 1929–30
Current surplus:
General fund	₱40,455,426.74½	₱51,789,035.28½	₱41,179,267.46½	−₱11,333,608.54	+₱10,609,767.82	−₱21,943,376.36

Permanent and long-term investments	53,957,978.83	53,203,465.69	53,578,160.70	+754,513.14	−374,695.01	+1,129,208.15
Fixed property	31,755,043.43	10,003,856.40	7,579,398.30	+21,751,187.03	+2,424,458.10	+19,326,728.93

It will be noted from the foregoing statement that the total current and invested surplus of ₱184,360,337.68½ in 1929 increased to ₱202,039,492.72½ in 1930, or a difference of ₱17,679,155.04 in favor of 1930. However, it will also be seen that at the close of the fiscal year under review, a decrease of ₱6,779,590.74 was registered in the current surplus as against an increase of ₱10,488,650.80 in the preceding year, thus resulting in a total decrease of ₱17,268,241.54. Had it not been for the value of supplies and materials and sales stock amounting to ₱300,156.26 brought into account by some bureaus as a result of inventory taking made by this office under the provisions of Act 3569, the total increase in the current surplus would have been ₱17,568,397.80. On the other hand, in the invested surplus an increase of ₱17,903,842.92 was registered for the same period, principally due to the bringing into account of the sum of ₱5,266,022.89 representing the value of irrigation systems constructed within the Friar lands estates, and ₱980,974.13 worth of equipment, also brought into account under act No. 3569 by some bureaus, which had not been accounted for in previous years. A comparison of the results of operation for the years 1930 and 1929 shows that the net accrual to the surplus is ₱635,601.38 as may be seen in the last column of the foregoing statement.

Current surplus: This item represents the liquid capital of the insular government upon the close of business on December 31, 1930, which, together with the estimated income for the year 1931, constitutes the basis for the proposed expenditures for that year as approved by the legislature. An analysis of the total current surplus of ₱73,056,572.06½ shows that it is made up not entirely of cash but partly of other forms of liquid items such as accounts receivable, supplies and materials, cadastral survey advances, and other assets which are more or less readily convertible into cash, as can be seen in the consolidated balance sheet on page 19 and which is more clearly detailed in the following statement:

It is of special interest to note from the foregoing analysis that of the total cash assets of ₱95,635,622.10½, the amount of ₱44,020,797.94 is set aside to offset current liabilities, thus leaving a net cash surplus of ₱51,614,824.16½ of which ₱21,937,830.37½, or 42½ per cent, pertains to the general fund. Of this general fund cash surplus, ₱16,525,732.10½ is free and available for appropriation, the rest, ₱5,412,098.27, being set aside to meet expenses for continuing appropriations. It will also be noted that besides the cash surplus, there is also current surplus of ₱18,517,596.37, consisting of various kinds of assets, most of which are convertible into cash and will, therefore, be also available for appropriation. The unappropriated cash surplus of ₱10,156,000 under the bond fund represents the proceeds of the bonds issued under Act 2999 and is held to protect the financial interests of the government, to guarantee the final redemption and payment of the circulating notes of the Philippine National Bank in accordance with Act 3174 as needs may arise, and to be invested in the manner prescribed by Act 3723. The remaining item of the bond fund surplus, which also consists of cash, represents the unexpended balances of several bond issues (see pp. 44 to 50) segregated in the consolidated balance sheet into appropriated-released and appropriated-unreleased, and detailed as follows:

"Conditions as to public finances, public order, and public health were generally satisfactory. The Philippine Islands naturally have not escaped the economic depression, which the entire world is undergoing. However, it appears that they have not suffered nearly as much as other countries. Although the prices of principal products have fallen, in some cases to the lowest level in 40 years, the increased volume has to a certain extent made up for loss in prices. While it can not be said that the general economic situation is good, there has been little or no actual physical suffering, due, as the Governor General points out, to 'the comparatively simple organization of society in the islands, to the climate, to the ease of living, and to the splendid feeling of family responsibility which is traditional among the Filipino people.'"

The revenues from ordinary sources—customs, internal revenue, and miscellaneous receipts—for the year 1930 were smaller by some $2,800,000 than the corresponding revenues for the preceding year. On the other hand, the ordinary expenditures of the government were greater by about $1,000,000 than those of the previous year. Nevertheless, the unappropriated cash surplus at the end of the year 1930 was more than $6,000,000. The report of the Governor General shows a decrease in the insular bonded indebtedness during the year 1930 of $2,525,000. The total amount of outstanding indebtedness is well within the limits provided by law and sinking funds are fully maintained to cover all outstanding bonds.

(From the 1930 Annual Report of the Secretary of War, pp. 11–12.)

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I very much regret that this tremendous problem, involving the honorable responsibilities of the United States and the ambitious destiny of the Philippine Islands, comes to us under the pressure of the closing hours of this difficult and perplexing session of Congress. We dare not dismiss it with a mere gesture of impatient haste. We must give it the survey and analysis, consulting it in its realities, which its far-flung implications involve. Anything less would be treason to our obligations.

The delay in bringing the legislation to conclusive hearing is not due to any lack of diligence or dedication or persuasion on the part of the sponsors of this independence legislation. They have persistently pressed for their day in court, as this special night session, under special order, demonstrates.

The delay has been solely due to the pressure of other and major emergency legislation which could not be set aside. Indeed, though the Philippine proposal has been on the Senate Calendar since the 1st of last March, and on the preferred list of the so-called steering committee of the Senate, of which I have the honor to be chairman, for many weeks, there has never up to now been an opportunity to proceed seriously with the discussion, and I welcome the opportunity, even though it be so late.

The delay, I repeat, Mr. President, has been unavoidable, and in no sense a disparagement of the importance of the issue. Nevertheless the delay has occurred, and in the weary climax of this session, meeting, as we do, under force and prolonged night schedule, I fear we scarcely have the time or mood to do serious and judicial labor upon the pending bill. Yet it would be criminal negligence to take anything for granted in this connection. I certainly say this with complete respect for the honorable and earnest Senators who have worked with zeal and solicitude upon this pending objective.

I do not complain of these eleventh-hour circumstances, Mr. President, but I lament the vicissitude, and I urge that it shall not be allowed to push us too precipitously to any inadvisable decision, no matter how nobly meditated.

My own discussion will be as brief as the magnitude of the subject permits. I apprehend that no Senator will cherish either the desire or the expectation that the Senate shall follow the cavalier example of another legislative body which recently gave the world the amazing spectacle of liquidating this 30-year-old problem in 40 hasty minutes, under the repression of a rule which permitted not so much as one amendment from the floor.

The question of Philippine independence is vital and pressing, but it involves no such summary necessity for the correction of exploitation and outrage as did our own exploited status under our own Declaration of Independence, although this erroneous analogy is often drawn.

It would be ridiculous to think of the Filipinos in terms of a down-trodden, throttled, and exploited colony. Such an abortive conception would be an insult to 30 years of altruistic American leadership in the creation of the most progressive and relatively the most prosperous and the happiest people in all the Far East. Indeed, Mr. President, I never read a finer apostrophe to this fact than in the initial testimony of the very able and brilliant head of the Filipino independence delegation in Washington at this time, my own good friend, Hon. Sergio Osmena, as he testified before the House Committee on Territories on January 22, 1932. I want to quote it:

> We fully appreciate what America has done for us—her unselfishness, her altruism, her generosity. More than 30 years ago she set out in the Philippines on a unique adventure, nobly conceived and faithfully carried out, to liberate a subject people. This had never been attempted before, but so consistent has been America's adherence to her noble purpose that her administration in the Philippines has established a new standard of justice in the treatment of dependent peoples. Readily casting aside the belief current among many colonizing nations that democracy can not thrive in the Tropics, she trained us in the art of self-government. Her success is now recognized. No other country under the tutelage of another has attained more substantial progress than the Philippine Islands during the same period of time. This is the opinion of impartial observers. We regard America as our friend and benefactor.

Mr. President, it is indeed refreshing to hear so eloquent and yet so truthful a tribute of testimony from so high a spokesman of the Filipino people with whom we have undertaken to deal so beneficently during the last 30 years.

I say, however, that in view of the truth of these facts, there is no precipitous necessity for immature action to reconstruct the Filipino status. Let no one misunderstand what I am trying to say. It is not that the question should not be settled now, because I shall make it immutably clear that that is not my viewpoint, but I am saying that it can not be done in the rush of a single evening hour, because the implications are too far-reaching, not only for us but for the Filipinos.

Certainly it would not be an act of friendship to ignore realities in a present world in which even the oldest and the strongest governments find it difficult to cope with contemporary instabilities. Certainly it would not be an act of friendship to launch the Filipinos' final great adventure under auspices calculated to threaten early and permanent failure. Hungry communism loves just such fallow ground as that.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that these considerations must temper the Senate's deliberative judgment, and that they challenge us to look before we leap. But I am not one of those who believe that these considerations warrant a present abandonment of all constructive and progressive efforts to anticipate the cherished and promised goal.

I am one of those who would attempt safely to answer the Philippine question, but I am not one of those who believe that any answer is better than no answer at all. On the contrary, it never will be answered until it is answered rightly, and with due regard not only to Filipino welfare and aspirations but also to American obligation and American honor.

Mr. President, let me make this clear again at the outset. I believe the United States is under both moral and explicit pledge to provide the Philippines with the free option of ultimate independence. This promise is implicit in utterances of every President of the United States since 1898. It is the specific warrant in the famous Jones preamble to the organic act of August 29, 1916.

While one Congress can not literally bind another, the unavoidable and unassailable historic fact remains that the Sixty-fourth Congress solemnly proclaimed our purpose, from which we ourselves can not retreat. It proclaimed that "It has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein," and that the people of the Philippines shall, when ready, "assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence."

Mr. President, that is a definite promise of independence. But the time and the specifications are indefinite. Our mutual trouble has been and now is that time and specifications are the vital essence of the pledge. Our immediate problem and responsibility are to take uncertainty out of these latter elements so far as that may be done by contemporary legislation. The need is to clarify our own thinking and specifically to instruct the Filipino people as to what we mean by a stable government and by the responsibilities of independence. Their need, in turn, is to contribute to this clarification with an eye on the next generation rather than on the next election.

I repeat that there is no escaping the implication of the Jones preamble. The Filipinos regard it as a warrant. They have builded the famous Jones Bridge in Manila as a monument to this faith. I regard it as an absolute obligation on our part. But I also repeat that I believe it is still the responsibility of the United States to exhaust every assurance that the Philippine republic, if and when established, shall stand for keeps, to make every supreme effort to assure that this climax shall be safe and sane, and sure and wholesome, and, most emphatically, to reach our conclusions in consultation of the best welfare of the Filipinos, rather than in consultation of our own selfish economic advantage, no matter how pressing.

Here, indeed, human life must be of first concern. In some American quarters to-day the aim and motive is not to free the Philippines from the United States but to free the United States from the Philippines. That, Mr. President, is a dangerous impulse, calculated to sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. I repudiate it. A decision born of such unenlightened selfishness would be unmoral, unsound, unworthy, and unsafe.

This does not mean that we are required to close our eyes to undue prudence that may be involved in our stewardship. It does not mean that we are never entitled to assess our own desperate continental economic needs in so far as they can legitimately factor as a by-product of the Philippine independence question. It does not mean, for example, that altruism demands of us that we totally ignore the economic fact that the balance of trade as between the Philippine Islands and the United States benefits the former in the ratio of about 4 to 1 and that we must neglect our right to equalize this ratio.

But we dare not determine the fate, Mr. President, of 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 people, our wards for 30 beneficial years, solely on the basis of what we may want or wish in respect to our own pocketbooks. We must make the decision primarily in behalf of the rights and the welfare of the Filipinos themselves, and with a decent respect to the opinions of mankind regarding the honorable disposition of our far-eastern responsibilities.

Now to the problem. It has been a problem in our politics as well as in Filipino politics for many years, and always will be until settled. It has been a problem in our Congress for many years and in many phases. These rival phases still persist to-night. Let me summarize nine different attitudes, at least five of which will require Senate decision before the final verdict is pronounced. Manifestly the Senate must contemplate these rival attitudes in making up its mind. Here briefly is a summary of these nine ideas:

First in order of apparent liberality is the idea of immediate, absolute, and complete independence. I think that any literal application of this idea may be dismissed, as the able and distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] has himself substantially just indicated. It is essentially a rhetorical slogan. It is still heard in poetical and patriotic apostrophes. It still lingers as an abstraction in native aspirations. But it no longer exists in the laboratory of reality. In literal fact it would be too cruel. Immediate and absolute independence without some period of intervening arrangement would simply mean immediate and absolute collapse. I believe the responsible leaders of the Filipinos themselves frankly acknowledge this intervening need, although their spokesmen in Washington, able and earnest men, for whom I have the profoundest respect, courageously insist that the interim shall be held to the minimums of necessity.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield; although I would like to complete my general argument.

Mr. PITTMAN. In order that the Senator may not be misunderstood, the representatives of the Legislature of the Philippine Islands are in entire accord with the limitations as to time and everything else in the Hawes-Cutting bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has vindicated the observation I was offering. Yet we still hear immediate, complete, and absolute independence frequently discussed, and since it is the very base of the pyramid it is necessary to canvass it in order to obtain a relative view of the other programs pending, because all programs are simply this program in progressive degree. I am saying that the demand for immediate, absolute, and complete independence has ceased to exist as a reality.

I noted the suggestions upon this score submitted by General Aguinaldo on July 25, 1931, in response to a questionnaire from my friend the able senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], in which this native warrior-patriot said:

> I would suggest a period of not more than 10 years, within which we hope to be able to adjust the economic difficulties attendant upon separation in a way satisfactory to both peoples.

Now note:

> If there is a will to do it, our independence could be granted us within the next five years.

That makes a total of 10 years.

> Whatever is desired to be adjusted regarding commerce and other interests here of the United States may be so adjusted within 10 years after the concession of freedom. These are reasonable periods of time and will not jeopardize anybody's interests.

Fifteen years a reasonable period of time.

Mr. Roxas, another very brilliant Filipino leader in Washington, and another whom I am proud to call my friend, frankly told the Senate Committee on Insular Affairs:

> There is no one in the Philippine Islands who does not believe that a sudden disruption of our economic relations would produce serious embarrassment to our economic system.

Hon. Pedro Gil, another member of the last Philippine independence mission, told a similar House committee:

> In the event that free trade is abolished, practically no other outlets will be immediately available for our products outside of the United States.

Senator Juan Sumalong, minority leader of the Philippine Senate, put the following plank in his independence platform:

> Continuation for a period of from 5 to 10 years of the present free trade between the United States and the Philippines.

Now, Mr. President, this is the thing I want to bring emphatically to your attention, that all through most of these quotations is not only the concession to the view that there must be time for rearrangement but there is an expression of the native hope that this time for rearrangement shall follow independence instead of preceding it. It is upon that point that I want to bear down at the moment lest there be any misunderstanding.

Unfortunately much of the independence agitation in the islands has proceeded upon the convenient theory that after the American flag comes down the dividends from a sort of absentee American protectorate will continue. The Wood-Forbes mission of 1921 said:

> We find everywhere among Christian Filipinos a desire for independence under the protection of the United States.

It is an anomaly to talk of independence and a protectorate in the same breath. It is a confession that independence in some quarters does not mean the same thing over there as over here. It is significant evidence that the whole discussion too frequently has avoided inconvenient yet pertinent reality, and the Senate will observe, as I proceed to my conclusion, that the one thing above all else for which I am pleading is a consultation of realities, because a decision upon any other base would be as unsafe as it would be unsound.

Mr. President, any native expectation for a prolonged period of American free trade following independence can be dismissed as an impossibility. One conviction unmistakably has taken hold of American public opinion, namely, if and when we leave the Philippines, we shall leave completely and permanently. There will be no postintependence tutelage. There will be no Platt amendment, as in the case of Cuba. There might be a reciprocal trade differential in our mutual tariff. I should hope so. But free markets will essentially disappear along with our flag. If this were immediate and absolute, or if it were in any degree premature, it would be a curse rather than a blessing. It would be of no benefit to the Philippines and no credit to the United States.

I think we may dismiss the idea of immediate absolute and complete independence. But it has been worth lingering upon, I repeat, because in our subsequent problems, when we come to writing a formula and fixing a time for a preindependence preparation, we continue to deal in many of these same factors. The only difference becomes a difference in degree.

I conclude this analysis of this first of nine proposals with a quotation from Prof. Joseph R. Hayden, of the political science department of the University of Michigan, who has spent many official years in the Philippines and who returned recently from his third trip to the islands. Professor Hayden expresses the ethnic as well as the economic hazards. I quote:

> Every year thousands of Chinese are smuggled in—this in spite of the rigid guard maintained by American officers. Once remove these officers and the situation would be far beyond the control of native agents. After gaining entrance, the Chinese seem to have a knack of taking business away from the Filipinos. At the present time a relatively small Chinese population controls from 80 to 85 per cent of the island mercantile business.

Then—this was last October—Professor Hayden significantly concludes:

> It would be extremely unfortunate if, at the present time, the United States should drop connections with the islands. The result would be the complete undoing of the work we have done there. The islands, which at the present time know no depression, would be ruined.

Now for the second of these nine proposals, and I shall not linger on the remainder of them, because, I repeat, each one of them involves the fundamental problem except in the matter of degree. The second of these nine proposals in order undoubtedly is the suggestions which will be offered in concrete form by the able and distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I would not presume to anticipate him. From my viewpoint the proposition which he will submit contemplating independence, as I understand, within four years, possesses in only slightly removed degree all the infirmities to which I have been adverting; but the Senator from Utah and I agree in this: If there is to be comparatively sudden independence it might better be as soon as physically possible rather than to drag it out across an inadequate and inconclusive span of years. Obviously it already is plain, however, that my own view prefers the adequate and the conclusive span of years.

The third of these nine proposals, in the order of speed, is the so-called Hare bill, which is now on the Senate Calendar and to which I shall pay my specific compliments in a few moments.

The fourth of these nine viewpoints, again speaking progressively, is the so-called Hawes-Cutting bill, which is immediately before the Senate and which has the benefit of a practically unanimous support from the Committee on Insular Affairs.

It contemplates independence in from 17 to 19 years. It is the product of an earnest effort to compose conflicting ideas. It bears the name of the able junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and that of the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. I may say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Missouri has been a scrupulous student of the Philippines and a loyal, persistent friend to their independence aspirations. In framing this pending measure he has generously and considerately sought a meeting of conflicting minds. He has written many of my own ideas into the pending bill, and I want publicly to thank him for his consideration. Perhaps the chief vice of the pending measure—and, of course, I do not use the word invidiously—is the very fact that it has reached out too assiduously for this meeting of minds and in this very composition has lost some of its own logic and continuity. I do not particularly quarrel with its tenure of years, but I think its progressive Philippine export limitations are too long in starting and too precipitous in concluding. Fundamentally I disagree with it, however, because it writes the new Philippine constitution at the beginning rather than at the end of the preindependence period. I consider this to be a fatal fallacy laden with serious implications. I believe that while America retains responsibility it must maintain the realities of authority. But let the detail of this analysis wait until we are done with our summary.

The fifth of these nine viewpoints is what may be calculated to be a conference compromise between the House and Senate bills, perhaps on a 10-year base. I have heard that suggested in conversation. I dread any conclusion of this proposed legislation, Mr. President, on the basis of an expedient conference compromise, and I cordially concur with the sentiment and observation submitted this evening by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] that we must follow through consecutively upon one or the other of these theories and that we can not expediently and conveniently patch them together in the manufacture of a compromise.

The sixth of these viewpoints, Mr. President, will be the substitute which I have drafted after faithful consultation with many students of the problem, and which I shall take the liberty of offering in a few moments. It has some philosophy in common with the Hawes-Cutting bill; but, in my humble judgment, it avoids some of the latter's pitfalls. Its objective is reached in from 20 to 21 years. It contemplates a Philippine constitution in the climax of this great adventure instead of on its threshold. But here again details may await the conclusion of this summary of viewpoints.

The seventh viewpoint is that of the War Department, which insists that we should define the ultimate attainment of Philippine independence in terms of objective rather than in fixed terms of years. It proceeds upon the theory—which can be powerfully defended—that the fallible human mind can not presume to anticipate conclusively just what the conditions will be either over here or over there 8 or 10 or 17 or 21 years ahead of time. This can not be gainsaid. Yet the preamble of the Jones law cries out for implements, and I would provide them if we can.

The eighth viewpoint is that which undoubtedly will again be urged by the able senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who insists that Congress has no constitutional authority whatever to alienate territory such as the Philippines when once it has come under the Stars and Stripes.

The ninth and final viewpoint is that of the citizen who bluntly insists that the question of Philippine independence shall be closed and never reopened, and that the Philippines shall remain an integral part of the United States. Here, in reminiscence of an earlier day, so-called imperialists and anti-imperialists will divide. So far as I am concerned, I stand upon the anti-imperialistic side.

I venture the assertion at this point, Mr. President, that the vast body of American public opinion falls within the bracket from the third to the seventh proposal heretofore outlined, which is to say, somewhere between the philosophies of the Hare bill, as it comes to us from the House, and the philosophies of the War Department, as I have just roughly sketched them. Organized agriculture and organized labor undoubtedly would prefer that the process be hastened. Yet the editorial opinion in the newspapers of the country probably is strongly favorable to the maximum postponement. But the Congress must decide the question upon its own conscience and without relation to any of these external forces or considerations.

As a basis for this choice let me give another quick summary—this time a fleeting view of these beautiful, fruitful, ambitious, and relatively happy islands, so that we may have our problem more intimately in mind.

They are not less than 20 days from California's Golden Gate. There are 7,083 of these tropical islands with a grand area matching that of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Vermont combined. Here are 13,000,000 people, of whom 91 per cent are Christians.

Here on the one hand are cities as progressive as any in the States, sometimes built with scrupulous regard for municipal beautification; here, on the other hand, are primitive tribesmen in the pagan hills. Yet, the farther you penetrate these hills the nearer you come to the grand canyons of rice terraces, which were an engineering triumph 2,000 years ago.

Here in these paradoxial islands are education and culture worthy of the world's best, with more than a million children in the public schools; but here also are backward provinces where occidental enlightenment has made little perceptible impression.

Here is a capital with more daily journals than any other city of its size on earth. They are notably progressive and well edited. But here also is a total daily circulation of only 164,000 newspapers in all the Philippines.

Here are the finest motor cars; here also is the wallowing carabao, carrying most of the rural burden. Yet here also are an excellent government owned and operated railroad and hotel running at a profit, and the finest municipal wharf and pier in the world at Manila.

Here is democracy upon the one hand and a paraphrase of feudalism upon the other. Here for 30 years many dialects and tongues have fruitlessly sought English as their common solvent after 300 futile years of kindred Spanish effort. Here these and innumerable other antitheses are in constant and striking challenge.

But here are law and order and security for property and person which could bring a blush of envy—if they ever blush—to some of the proudest precincts of continental United States. Here are a people of tender sensibilities, of open-hearted hospitality, of brave ambitions. Here progressive political autonomy has made striking conquest. Here are remarkable evidences of racial progress. This progress is an indivisible credit, on the one hand, to native adaptability and aspirations; and, on the other hand, to the influence and direction of American stewardship for three fruitful decades. Here is the brightest, happiest, cleanest, most prosperous spot in an otherwise turbulent, benighted, and nearly bankrupt Orient.

All this proceeds under the Stars and Stripes. The burning question to be answered, as definitely and as soon as possible, is whether the flag stays up or whether the flag comes down; and if so, when and how.

Magellan originally discovered the Philippine Islands in 1521. But they were made known to most Americans by Admiral Dewey one celebrated morning in 1898. Even then these Malays were bravely intent upon establishing their own republic, and did so temporarily with a constitution of their own making, which included, significantly, a veritable Anglo-Saxon Bill of Rights. They passed to American sovereignty in the liquidation of the Spanish War, with a new vision, a new privilege, and a new opportunity in life. There has been sympathetic, helpful, and beneficial control. There has not been, and of course must not be, the remotest semblance of greedy exploitation. The time has come to face facts, both in Washington and in Manila. Does the flag stay up? If not, when and how does it come down?

I visited these delightful islands and these hospitable people one year ago. My visit was utterly inadequate to give me any authority of counsel in the pending matter, and I expressly disclaim any such presumption. But my visit illuminated my prior studies of the problem; it amended certain of my own prior notions; it changed my mind in some respects; but it confirmed the opinions and the attitude which I now take upon the pending bill.

I want to read to the Senate the public statement which I made in Manila the morning that I sailed away:

I leave these beautiful and rich islands with intensified respect for the great progress which is being made in the Philippines and for their future possibilities. Here are constantly increasing occidental standards and advantages in the heart of an oriental world. It is the solemn responsibility of every lawmaker, whether in Manila or Washington, to deal with the future of the islands in a way which will best preserve and promote these benefits. The utility of government is to be tested not by its forms but its results reflected in the lives, fortunes, and security of its people. This is the rule of action needed in relation to Phil-American contacts.

Speaking only for myself and not presuming to commit anyone else, I am confirmed in the opinion that the future status of the islands now must be a problem in economics rather than in political forms. So far as political forms go, you already have about 98 per cent of autonomy. If that were all that is involved, your status would be no problem at all. But economic autonomy is something else. Economic self-sufficiency is the vital foundation of stability, particularly at a time when even the oldest and strongest of countries are finding national economics perilous. There can be no political stability without economic stability.

This phase calls for absolute candor both in Manila and in Washington. Immediate independence or premature independence will be accompanied by a concurrent foreclosure to you of America's free markets in which you sell nearly 80 per cent of your exports, and upon which you must depend for your favorable balance of trade. The imminence of this foreclosure is clear from the nature of the new and dominant support which the independence movement enjoys in the States. It is a support engendered by an anxiety to stop your free trade in America as quickly as possible.

Any such sudden wrench to your economic status would be nothing short of a calamity. It not only would impair the livelihood of every man, woman, and child in the islands; it also would scuttle your public revenues at the very moment when you would confront the inevitable need of heavily increased tax budgets. The mere increase in political autonomy from 98 per cent to 100 per cent could not remotely compensate for such a staggering economic prospectus. Indeed the government itself would be calculated to stagger in similar degree.

Facts are facts. This is one of many to be frankly and courageously faced. I take away with me a new sense of responsibility to consult all of these realities for the sake of your true welfare. The greater your present progress, the greater would be the tragedy of needless error in charting your future. There is nothing automatic in the benefits of independence. Your final great adventure should be launched at a time and under circumstances best calculated to warrant permanent success rather than the possibility of disastrous failure.

But you are entitled to be relieved of the curse of uncertainty so far as this can be done by legislation. Uncertainty prevents long-range planning. It stunts development. It produces ceaseless agitation, which is a poor substitute for progress. We need a just formula for this final preindependence period.

It seems to me that candor requires consent on our part that you shall have the unequivocal option of ultimate independence under fixed specifications after a final adequate term of economic preparation, which for your sake might fare better be too long than too short.

It requires consent on your part that these specifications shall be practical and not precipitous and that you shall have a just regard for some of our own related problems on the mainland. I know you will be responsive because after all America's 30 altruistic years in the Philippines have demonstrated the good faith of our attitudes.

It requires of us that we do not deal with you solely to suit our own economic convenience, which many think would best be served by completely cutting the economic string to-morrow. It requires of you that you do not ignore your own economic necessities as distinguished from your political aspirations, and that you do not pursue a slogan instead of a reality.

It requires of both that we do not jeopardize a fine, wholesome, happy culmination of this great adventure which has proceeded so nobly under the American flag. Neither an anti-Philippine attitude in America nor an anti-American attitude in the Philippines will do.

We all need prayerful study of these realities in quest of a rational program which shall best serve all concerned. I feel better equipped to go on with my own small part in this quest as a result of my visit. I am deeply grateful to all who have made these recent days so memorable for me. I hope for the finest possible Filipino future.

Mr. President, one year has since passed. I would not change a word in this statement. It was generously accepted at the time in the native press. Editorials were friendly—so much so that the Literary Digest, on June 18, 1931, mobilized a page of opinions from this native press, particularly emphasizing, if I may be pardoned the personal reference, the comment of the Manila Herald that "Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, is the leader of a desirable compromise."

Mr. President, the most desirable possible compromise which I can offer I shall presently lay upon the Senate's bar.

It will be noted that I put great stress upon the economic phase. So must the Senate, no matter which plan it embraces, if it would do justice to the Philippines. Gov. Gen. Dwight Davis, who recently concluded a highly honorable and able administration at Manila, frankly said in his annual message of July 11, 1931, that trade relations with the United States had been the islands' savior in these perilous economic times. I regret that these relations have been reciprocally burdensome to the United States. Certainly we are entitled to fair adjustments, regardless of the independence outcome. But we are not entitled knowingly to precipitate our island wards into a fore-ordained economic wreck.

Experts have estimated that the immediate effect of independence at any time upon all Philippine exports to the United States would be a loss of not less than $55,000,000, or about 43 per cent of the total export trade to all countries. This would precipitate a general reduction of labor wages and standards to the normal oriental basis of bare existence. Domestic trade would suffer sympathetically. Land values would be greatly reduced, which in turn would jeopardize the public revenues, because 33 per cent of the provincial revenues, 51 per cent of the general municipal revenues, and 74 per cent of the Manila revenues are derived from land taxes. Conservative prophets believe that the income of the Philippine government in import duties, sales tax, excise tax, income tax, wharfage charges, United States tax remissions on tobacco, and from other sources would immediately decrease from the 1920–1929 average of $40,000,000 to not more than $25,000,000. The Budget just balances at present, thanks to curtailment in many public expenditures for such things as sanitation, health, and new construction. Obviously, the result of further domestic curtailment would mean fewer schools, lower health standards, and a general retrogression from occidentalism to orientalism. Not the least serious phase of such a contemplation is the fact that even now, according to Red Cross testimony, malnutrition is the chief mass handicap from which the Filipino race suffers.

Independence ceases to be a pretty picture under such auspices. Indeed, it is not a picture which either the Filipinos or we Americans, after 30 years of altruistic partnership, could tolerate. It would be a hideous anticlimax. Nor would it satisfy the Jones preamble. It could not envision stable government. On the contrary, it would be an open invitation either to anarchy or to communism.

At this very moment of dire economic crisis, the new and independent Philippine government would immediately require more, rather than less, of a tax budget. It could expect no added aid from increased import duties, because the islands' buying power would be depleted. Yet it would have to pay for its own national defense and its own diplomatic and consular service, all of which is now an American contribution. It would have to support a much larger constabulary for domestic security. It would have to pay much more for public loans, if it could get them at all, because this type of money costs at least 7 per cent in other comparable countries, whereas at present the influence of American stability produces loans as low as a 4.28 per cent basis. Meanwhile another large source of island income, estimated at $15,000,000 a year, would disappear with the withdrawal of the American Army and Navy.

We must not climax our great Philippine adventure by precipitating these fine, relatively contented, prosperous, happy, and secure people into a governmental fatality.

These are but a few of the economic reasons why we must proceed with care. We owe it to our responsibilities. Yet these are not reasons why we should decline to proceed at all. I have no more sympathy with a denial of action than I have with precipitous and premature action. Furthermore, before we dismiss the trade balances between the Philippines and the United States as wholly prejudicial, let us candidly assess credits as well as debits.

The debits involve chiefly sugar, coconut oil, and hemp products. I state, parenthetically, at this point that my substitute will begin a quicker limitation upon these exports to us, although under a more livable régime than any of these others at present pending proposals.

But how about the trade credits? The Philippines continue to be the largest market, on the absolute basis of dollar value, for American cotton piece goods and canned milk, and among the largest for wheat flour, tinned fish, fruits, vegetables, and numerous other items. American agriculture, in other words, will lose as well as gain in the event of suspending reciprocal free trade. American industry meanwhile has a substantial stake in the sales of motor cars, machinery, electrical apparatus, wire and steel and kindred products in the islands. It has a substantial stake in raw materials which it always must import from the Tropics. Other such credits include the large amount of American capital which has been encouraged to enter the islands and engage in their development. They include the speculative value of a great American trade base at the threshold of the greatest undeveloped exporting market left in the world, where the stabilization of economic life for 750,000,000 oriental people will some day produce the richest trade opportunities of modern times. No visitor to the Far East can fail to sense these possibilities. No visitor to the Philippines can fail to sense their rare potentialities. No student of American balance sheets can fail to understand our own vital stake in an unfolding Orient.

These are not the factors which rightly should dominate our Philippine decisions. But the point is that if our selfish economics are to be argued in favor of hasty Philippine independence regardless of Philippine welfare, then our selfish economics also should be argued for what bearing they may have in a different direction. Incidentally, our prestige in the Far East is of thoroughly tangible importance, and that prestige could suffer no deadlier blow than from a Philippine debacle as the ultimate product of our far Pacific stewardship.

Mr. President, let me now revert once more to summaries. The Senate's direct judgment must be taken between the King bill, the Hare bill, the Hawes-Cutting bill, and what I shall identify as the Vandenberg bill. Here is a summary of the rule of action by which I think the decision should be made.

First. I believe the United States unequivocally is bound by solemn obligation—frequently expressed and always implied—to withdraw its sovereignty over the Philippine Islands when a stable government is in existence and when the people of the Philippines are ready, as defined in the Jones preamble of August 29, 1916, to "assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence." I believe the measure of this "stability"—this capacity for the "responsibilities of complete independence"—is not political alone, but also and emphatically economic, because economic collapse is the root source of most governmental paralysis to-day all round the globe. This is precisely what the late President Taft said as long ago as December 6, 1912, when he uttered this pregnant observation:

> We would endeavor to secure for the Filipinos economic independence and to fit them for complete self-government with the power to decide eventually according to their largest good, whether such self-government shall be accompanied by independence.

Second. I believe that the Filipino people have made amazing strides in the forms and philosophy of political government under our generous tutelage, which already gives them fully 98 per cent of electoral autonomy, including the direct election of 22 out of 24 senators, 86 out of 95 representatives, 44 out of 48 provincial governors and boards; also including complete home rule in 900 municipal departments, also including 98 per cent of the places in the civil service, also including domination of the Governor General's cabinet and within one of a majority of their supreme court. There are still some submerged and backward people. There is still a question about unassimilated groups in the mountains and in the southern islands. But as an abstract proposition I believe that Filipino progress in self-government gives political promise—political, mind you—of adequacy and ultimate stability within a reasonable definition of the Jones preamble. After all, we can not expect a complete Malay paraphrase of Anglo-Saxon government. Therefore I do not feel that the essential experiments remaining to be made in this probationary progress are primarily political. They are economic.

Third. I believe the United States must retain effectual authority in the islands so long as it retains responsibility in the islands. Therefore I am opposed to proposals for a new constitution and a new form of native government at the beginning of the final probationary period. I think it should be the end and climax. If set up now, with the probationary period yet to run its course, it inevitably invites the shadow of divided authority, even though it avoids the substance. This is a frank but considered change of view, as is also my present view of the essential time element, since I originally introduced my first Philippine bill on January 31, 1930.

Fourth. I should be less than candid with the Senate if I did not state my further belief that the Filipino people, enjoying 98 per cent of autonomy, are infinitely better off and happier in material considerations under the American flag than they will be under their own. But they are entitled to their own flag when their preparation is complete. It is our task to implement the Jones preamble with a bill of particulars—difficult though it be to attempt to penetrate the problems of the future—and then to let the Filipinos ultimately decide their own destiny for themselves in the fullness of an experience which shall have taught them what "the responsibilities of independence" mean.

Mr. President, I now send my substitute to the desk and formally offer it. To save time I ask that its reading be dispensed with at the moment, but that for the information of the Senate it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, this puts three specific propositions thus far textually before the Senate—the Hare bill from the House, the Hawes-Cutting bill from the Senate committee, and my substitute. At this point I send a letter to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: I have noted the provisions of the amendment (in the nature of a substitute) intended to be proposed by you in connection with the bill S. 3377, to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution, etc.
>
> While I am not in accord with the provisions of the amendment, the latter is, from the viewpoint of this department, preferable to either the Hawes-Cutting bill or the Hare bill.
> For the reasons which I have stated to the committee, I reiterate that action on this legislation at this time is not desirable.
> Sincerely yours,
> PATRICK J. HURLEY,
> Secretary of War.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think we owe it to ourselves to take cognizance of the attitude of the department primarily charged with Philippine administration. It is opposed to all this present legislation, as I have previously stated. But it finds the substitute just presented less objectionable than the other two proposals. It would more nearly meet the department's view.

As between these bills, first let me speak of the Hare bill, which may be said to represent the House conception, which was approved in 40 minutes by a House vote of 306 to 47.

But what a conception! I speak respectfully, but in earnest protest, against program which the Secretary of State, himself a former Governor General of the islands, described as "selfishness and futility" in a letter made public the day of this amazing roll call. I speak in complete sympathy with an editorial observation in the New York Herald Tribune the following morning which said in part:

> This bill sentences the Philippines to eight years of political turmoil, and then to economic ruin, if not to extinction.

Mr. President, in my humble judgment the ninth year of experience in the Philippine Islands under the Hare bill would be a year of sackcloth and ashes, if not worse. Even though a reciprocal trade relationship were created under section 2 of the House bill, it would mean that in the first year of the Philippine Republic its export commodities, the backbone of its economic life, would suddenly lose 80 per cent of their free markets, and, on the basis of last year's trade, confront the better part of $60,000,000 in new American customs duties—a sum almost twice the annual budget of the native government.

Could any government, new or old, survive such a sudden and fundamental wrench to its trade relations? Could this new Philippine Republic, simultaneously burdened with an infinity of other perplexities, stand up under such a desperate economic blow? Is it fair to our hopes for an ultimate permanence for a Philippine Republic to fling our erstwhile wards and friends to any such devastating jeopardy? Is it fair to the hopes of the Filipinos themselves? Is it sanity in a realistic world?

I dislike to say it. But the solemnity of this responsibility, Mr. President, calls upon all of us—whether in Washington or in Manila—to speak our true minds or to forever after hold our peace.

In my judgment, any such prospectus would be the deadliest possible blow which could be leveled at the peace and happiness of the Filipino people, and an advance warrant of ignoble failure for a great, free, and successful Philippine Republic.

In my judgment, any such prospectus would be the deadliest possible blow which could be struck against the honorable liquidation of American responsibilities in the Far East.

Meanwhile, let us not ignore the lengthened shadows of these same hazards, though in mitigated degree, as we proceed.

Now we reach the Hawes-Cutting bill and my substitute for it. Both are built on the theory of preindependence economic preparation. Indeed, they have much in common. Yet they depart from each other in several considerations which I hold to be vital if we shall take maximum precaution against any of the possible tragedies to which I have previously adverted. I have dwelt upon the possible tragedies by way of admonition and not by way of discouragement against any forward march. Let me say that I believe emphatically that it is possible to write a safe formula, and that it is our duty so to try to do, but conservatism is a virtue in this pursuit. Economic self-sufficiency in the islands is the key to this success. It calls primarily for agrarian diversification and sufficient time to make it effectual. There are incalculable opportunities in this direction. I submit an excerpt upon this score from the last annual report of Governor General Davis, because it shows so plainly the undeveloped possibilities which can be enlisted in the cause if time and opportunity are adequately permitted.

Both the Hawes-Cutting bill and my substitute limit immigration immediately. In this aspect, and in the further requirement that the Filipino legislature must ratify the new ritual before it becomes effective, the proposals are identical. The principal differences are as follows:

First. The Hawes-Cutting formula is built on a 15-year base—actually 17 or more. The Vandenberg formula is built on a 20-year base. But both lead to the unequivocal option of ultimate independence. I do not believe it is possible to work out a progressive economic program that will be practical under 20 years, for reasons which will presently appear.

Second. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides a native constitution and native government at the inception of the probationary period. The Vandenberg bill provides for the constitution at the end of the period on the theory, first, that American authority must continue as long as American responsibility continues; and, second, that the native constitution is logical only as the climax rather than as the inception of the probation. The Vandenberg bill, however, increases native autonomy under the existing order by providing a complete legislative cabinet. It seems to me that it is vital in a correct philosophy of action that the existing structure of Philippine government should not be fundamentally changed to fit the prospectus of a subsequent republic until the economic probation is completed and until the native decision for an ultimate republic is made and the republic is ready to function. Otherwise, we have the cart before the horse. We leap before we look. We invite what may too easily and too dangerously be interpreted as a surrender of essential authority during the probationary years, when we still carry the sovereign responsibility. Twilight zones of responsibility in government are calculated to invite delicate and doubtful interludes. This could be particularly true 10,000 miles from home. I opposed this section of the Hawes-Cutting bill in committee but was outvoted. I regret that I can not surrender my conviction that it is a controlling weakness in the whole structure of the bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To put it in simple words, I gather from what I have just listened to that it would be fully 20 years before the Filipino people would be fully independent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I assume that the Senator thinks it would take 20 years to enable them to prepare to control their own destiny?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; that is not the point at all. I think the Filipino people have progressed politically in a most amazing degree. At the present moment they have 98 per cent of political autonomy, and I think they are justifying their possession of that 98 per cent. I am saying that when we lay out a formula which looks to an ultimate definite independence, whether it be 17 years, as under the Hawes-Cutting plan, or 21 years, as under the substitute I have proposed, it is not logical to create the constitution of the ultimate republic the first year they start upon that probationary journey, that it is an anticlimax when the ultimate period of independence is reached, and that during the interim you have surrendered at least the semblance of essential authority while you yet retain the responsibility.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why should we not give them their independence next year, and let them work out their own destiny?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, at 2 minutes to 10 o'clock I hesitate to revert to that point, which I reached at 8.30. I say that with great respect to the Senator; but I am anxious to conclude.

The third difference between the Hawes-Cutting bill and my substitute is in respect to the economic limitations.

Third. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides for limitations upon free American markets for sugar and hemp products and coconut products for 10 years on the basis of present Philippine exports to the United States; thereafter it switches to straight tariffs with an annual step-up in rates. The Vandenberg bill provides these same initial limitations for 5 instead of 10 years, and then progressively reduces these limitations in each subsequent 3-year period.

If we are to launch the theory of limitations, and I favor it, I believe it is necessary to start them sooner and progress with them more regularly over a longer period of time than the Hawes-Cutting bill provides or permits. Thus it can be done safely and in successful defiance of the economic hazards which I have previously stressed. Under the Hawes-Cutting bill these limitations would switch to yearly changes in tariffs from the tenth to the fifteenth year.

I do not believe that any people could survive such constant tariff turmoil. We know of our own experience that one general tariff revision in a decade is a source of difficulty and unrest. It seems to me that this era of annual tariff flux would be an inevitable era of menace. I submit it would be far preferable to cling consistently to the theory of limitations from beginning to end; to make the progressive changes on a regular schedule every three years as provided in the substitute; and to take a few years longer in the ultimate process, permitting the native legislature to decide for itself at each interval whether it desires, out of native experience, to persist in the progression. A short step forward must not result in a long step backward. It is better to be safe than sorry. There is too great a stake, particularly in precious human hopes, to justify doubtful experiments.

Under the Hawes-Cutting bill these limitations would switch to yearly changes in tariffs from the tenth to the fifteenth year. I do not believe that many people on earth could survive a yearly change in tariff. They would live in a continuous and perpetual economic turmoil. We have all that we can do to survive one general tariff revision in a decade. Here is a tariff change every year from the tenth to the fifteenth years. I submit that that is not a safe economic reliance. I submit that it is infinitely better to take a few more years, to be safe instead of sorry, and to develop within those years an adequate progression by easy stages so that when the climax is reached it is not reached at the end of the shock, but is reached in sensible graduation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would the Senator prefer not to be interrupted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED. At this point it occurs to me that there is one matter which, during the time I have been listening, has not been mentioned. It seems to be an omission in both the Hawes-Cutting bill and in the substitute. I refer to the matter of the future neutrality of the islands. Granted that we assume no protectorate over them, ought we not to make a condition precedent to the granting of independence the achievement of a treaty of neutrality among all of those countries that might have an interest in violating the neutrality?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator's suggestion is utterly sound, and, of course, has been borne in mind in like discussions by all of us.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. The representative of Japan has stated that they would sign such an agreement, but if we withhold our opinion until England says she will come in, or until France says she will come in, we will have legislation by foreign countries instead of by the United States.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; what I meant to suggest is a clause in the bill which would provide that in no event should independence be given until such and such nations should have joined with us in a treaty of neutrality. We can always amend it, and I can scarcely believe that any nation invited in advance would refuse to join in such a treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whatever the merits or otherwise of this particular situation, these bills of the moment involve a fundamental challenge respecting a philosophy of action; and if the Senator will permit me, I should prefer to conclude my analysis of the difference in summary between the two bills.

The fourth difference between the bills is this: The Hawes-Cutting bill provides no opportunity for the Filipinos to change their minds, when once the 15-year program is launched, if its economic burdens should become too heavy. The Vandenberg bill permits the Filipino Legislature to pass upon the proposition at each 3-year interval if it so desires. It transfers the entire responsibility to the Filipinos to make these subsequent decisions. It makes them the masters of their own destiny and the captains of their own fate.

Fifth. The Hawes-Cutting bill permits the ultimate American retention of existing American Army and naval bases. The Vandenberg bill requires a final survey by the President and Congress at the end of the probation and permits the United States to make whatever final disposition may be advisable, even to the possible extent of moving military and naval bases to other islands.

Sixth. The Vandenberg bill makes more specific commitments to assure the retirement of the Philippine public debt, for which the United States has a moral responsibility. It differs in other structural details.

Mr. President, I regret the necessity for having so long trespassed upon the Senate's time and forbearance. But in conscience I have seen no way to avoid this full discussion which I can only hope may give the Senate pause in its decision upon a tremendously important problem which we must not expediently dismiss with casual conclusion in the pressure of this session's closing hours. I subscribe myself a friend of Philippine independence in a day and with a structure that shall warrant permanence. Meanwhile I renew my acknowledgments of the great good faith and notable zeal with which the Senate authors of the bill upon the calendar have pursued their service to the independence cause. I shall be happy if a justified bill results.

But if all this substantive legislation respecting Philippine independence fails at this session, Mr. President, nevertheless I am constrained to say that the cause has gained. As a result of committee studies in both branches of Congress, and as a result of discussion upon the floor, and as a result of the intensive survey of both in the American press, there is a clearer conception in this country of the necessity for developing a progressive program in keeping with our long-time pledges and in sympathy with legitimate and laudable Filipino aspirations. At the same time I dare to hope that there is a more tangible realization, in the islands themselves, that independence is just as much a problem in responsibilities as in privileges; that liberty entails obligations as well as oratory; and that the surest advantage for the future lies in a mutually candid survey of our relationships to the end that this adventure shall culminate to the glory and honor both of the Philippines and the United States.

If all this present legislation fails, our common problem is to capitalize this legislative experience into maximum dividends for to-morrow. It were far better for the Filipinos themselves that improper legislation should fail, if we learn new lessons from the failure, than that a noble impulse should rush us and them into error which we both might bitterly repent at leisure.

I am not prophesying failure of this present legislative effort, Mr. President, but in conclusion I am assessing the possibilities subsequent to such a contingency. In such an event I am suggesting that in the interim before another Congress meets the Philippine government itself should address itself constructively to the formulation of new proposals which shall fit a rational and practical prospectus. The Filipinos now know in a general way what they can and what they can not expect. Their leaders know in their hearts that "immediate, absolute, and complete independence" is just as futile as it would be fatal. Our leaders know equally well that American public opinion insists upon a reasonable program to implement the Jones preamble and to permit these 13,000,000 people the unequivocal right of ultimate self-determination.

In the event of present legislative failure to conclude the issue, I dare to hope that the Filipinos themselves will use the congressional recess to develop concrete suggestions of their own. At the moment I am thinking particularly of a notable interview with Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, undisputed mentor of Philippine statecraft, published as recently as April 3, 1932. In this interview Senator Quezon outlined his notion of what might even be a permanent liaison between the Philippines and the United States on what might be called a dominion status. While I dissent from some of the views submitted in this interview, I applaud the constructive candor which prompted it and the practical common sense which trade-marks its trends. It typifies what I believe should be the native thinking during the next six months.

We have struggled with independence formulae at our end of the line and we have made progress. Thus far they, from their end of the line, have brought us officially nothing but a stolid demand for "immediate, absolute, and complete independence." Although it is our responsibility to provide the final formula, I venture the suggestion that they themselves can facilitate the operation. Running all through these bills and these debates is a common thread. They point the way to simplifications of the issue which the Philippine Legislature itself can contribute, and thus contributing, can hasten the happy day of ultimate agreement. It can, upon its own responsibility, limit emigration to the continental United States. It can, upon its own responsibility, limit its own exports to the United States in respect to a few commodities which unfairly depress our continental markets, and it can thus establish a statesmanlike impulse to the agrarian and industrial diversification, which is its sole economic hope as a free country. Having done these things upon its own initiative, it has, I repeat, immensely simplified the issue between us. It has spectacularly demonstrated its grasp upon the realities of the problem. It has forged ahead in practical statesmanship in a fashion to justify the confidence of its continental friends.

Then let it come to us—not with a slogan, however nobly uttered, which is bankrupt of practical potentialities, but with its conception of what our formula should be, in the light of the clear purposes which are common to practically all of the independence bills that have had substantial support in the American Congress.

Such, Mr. President, are the possibilities of far-flung advantage which can grow out of the present situation, even though the present situation fails to conclude a bill. One year is but a moment in the life of a nation. If it is not marked by the conclusion of an actual independence formula, but if it is marked by substantial clarifications in freedom's optional direction, it is yet a highly useful and propitious year.

So much for the alternative.

The immediate problem is the pending bill and its substitutes. For the reasons heretofore submitted in sustained detail, Mr. President, I offer the formula which I have sent to the desk. I can claim for it no pontifical reliance. But in my humble judgment it addresses itself to the best and most reliable answer to the pending question at the Senate's bar.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. REED. It seems obvious that we do the Philippines no kindness in giving them independence from us to be gobbled up very soon by some others stronger than themselves. I understand that the Senator has characterized as utterly reasonable, or some such phrase, my suggestion that we should try to accomplish a treaty of neutrality such as that to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Did the Senator say "utterly reasonable"?

Mr. REED. Yes. If it is utterly reasonable, would not the Senator's amendment be improved by inserting a paragraph calling for the accomplishment of such a treaty as a condition precedent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it would.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator would not resent or resist it if I were to offer an amendment to his substitute to that effect when we come to consider it?

Mr. VANDENBERG. When the Senator says that we would make it a condition precedent, I say I would not resist it if he does not mean that the ultimate adventure in independence could never be undertaken until and unless such a treaty were to be written. I could not consent to that method of foreclosing any development in the future.

Mr. REED. Ah, but it is to be assumed that future Congresses will have as much wisdom as ourselves; and if it were found to be a perpetual barrier, a future Congress would modify that requirement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me say to the Senator that I would be delighted to consider most sympathetically the idea which he is discussing.

Mr. REED. If the Senator does not mind my protracting the discussion——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am glad to have the Senator proceed.

Mr. REED. Here is the point: The Japanese, who have been most often mentioned in this connection, have more or less officially indicated their readiness to join us in such a treaty. Assuming that they are willing to do so, I should think that other nations less closely interested would be similarly willing, and that for the sake of these wards of ours, whom we are going to launch out on a cruel and stormy world, we ought, at least, give them that protection. If we do not exercise a protectorate—and I know the Senator and I are in agreement that we should not—then surely we owe them the advantage of a treaty of neutrality which will make it the concern of the civilized nations of the world if they should be pounced upon by some greedy power.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I entirely concur in the Senator's philosophy.

Mr. REED. I am encouraged to hear the Senator say that. I notice also——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I will finish in a moment. I notice also the Senator has put in a provision, being section 15, I think, which allows the President to designate such lands as the United States may need in perpetuity for naval or military purposes. Does not the Senator think there might be an advantage in adding to that a provision which would authorize us to have some sort of commercial toe hold in that part of the world, such as the British have in Hong Kong, for example?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

Mr. REED. And that could very well be done in connection with one of these military or naval bases.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will be very glad to canvass that suggestion with the Senator.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator think that over for insertion in the particular paragraph?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield if I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield the floor.

The substitute proposed by Mr. VANDENBERG is as follows:

Whereas the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916, declared it to be the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

Whereas the stability of a government is necessarily dependent upon the capacity of that government to function in its economic aspects: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 22 and 23 of the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 22. That the executive departments of the Philippine government shall continue as now authorized until otherwise provided by law. The Philippine Legislature may hereafter by appropriate legislation increase the number of the executive departments, or may abolish any of them, or may make such changes in the names and duties thereof as it may see fit, and shall provide for the appointment and removal of the heads of the executive departments by the Governor General: Provided, That nothing in this section, or in any law of the Philippine government enacted pursuant thereto, shall limit the power of the Governor General to remove for cause the head of any executive department and that all executive functions of the government shall continue as heretofore, to be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General.

"The president of the Philippine Senate shall, as soon as practicable after the organization of the Philippine Legislature at the session thereof next after each general election, submit to the Governor General recommendations for heads of the several executive departments. The Governor General shall, except for adequate reasons, make appointments in accordance with such recommendations and by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate. Should any name submitted to the Governor General be unacceptable to him, or be rejected by the Philippine Senate, the president of the senate shall submit another name until the appropriate office shall be duly filled.

"Membership in the senate or house of representatives shall not be a bar to appointment as head of an executive department.

"The president of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, and the heads of the several executive departments shall constitute the cabinet of the Governor General.

"If at any time the Philippine Senate should select a new president thereof, the Governor General shall reconstitute his cabinet upon the recommendation of the new president of the senate in accordance with the procedure hereinbefore prescribed.

"The bureau of non-Christian tribes, as heretofore established, shall continue to have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

"SEC. 23. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, a vice governor of the Philippine Islands, who shall have all of the powers of the Governor General in the case of a vacancy or temporary removal, resignation, or disability of the Governor General, or in case of his temporary absence, and to whom may be assigned such other duties, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as the Governor General may designate.

"The President of the United States shall designate the president of the Philippine Senate to act as Governor General in the case of the temporary removal, resignation, or disability of both the Governor General and the vice governor, or their temporary absence, and the Acting Governor General thus designated shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of the Governor General during such vacancy, disability, or absence.

"In case of the temporary removal, resignation, or disability of the Governor General, the vice governor, and the president of the senate, or the temporary absence of all of these, the President of the United States may designate to act as Governor General the speaker of the house of representatives or the head of an executive department of the Philippine government, and the Acting Governor General thus designated shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of the Governor General during the vacancy, disability, or absence in question."

SEC. 2. At any time during the eighteenth year from and after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act become effective, the Philippine Legislature may formulate and draft a proposed constitution for a free, independent, and sovereign government of the Philippine Islands, subject to the conditions and qualifications prescribed in this act.

The territory subject to such independent government of the Philippine Islands as may be established under the provisions of this act shall be the Philippine Islands ceded to the United States Government by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 11th day of April, 1899, the boundaries of which are set forth in Article III of said treaty, together with those islands embraced in the treaty between Spain and the United States concluded at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900, excluding, however, such territory, if any, of the said islands as may be reserved or excepted therefrom pursuant to the provisions of section 15 of this act.

SEC. 3. Any constitution for an independent government of the Philippine Islands that may be formulated and drafted pursuant to this act shall include provisions to the following effect:

(1) That the government of the Philippine Islands recognizes the exclusive sovereignty, jurisdiction, and control of the United States over any territory withdrawn from the present limits of the Philippine Islands and reserved to the United States by proclamation of the President of the United States, issued pursuant to the provisions of section 15 of this act.

(2) That the government of the Philippine Islands recognizes as the property of the United States, reserved exclusively for its purposes and uses, all immovable property of the United States, set forth and indicated for retention, by the United States, in any proclamation of the President of the United States, issued as provided for in subsection (b) of section 15 of this act.

(3) That the government of the Philippine Islands recognizes as its own all debts and obligations, direct and indirect, contracted by the Philippine government, its Provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities while under the sovereignty of the United States.

(4) That all acts of the United States in the Philippine Islands during the exercise of its sovereignty over these islands are ratified and validated, and all lawful rights acquired thereunder shall be maintained and protected.

(5) That the property rights of the United States in the Philippine Islands shall be fully acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded, and that any question that may be pending at the date when an independent government of the Philippine Islands may be established, or that may thereafter arise, regarding the respective property rights of the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be promptly adjusted and settled.

(6) That all existing property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States, and all such rights as may hereafter lawfully be acquired by them, shall be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded to the same extent as property rights of citizens of the Philippine Islands.

(7) That all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States are assumed by the independent government of the Philippine Islands and will be duly discharged by the same.

(8) That the government of the Philippine Islands assumes all obligations, direct or indirect, of the United States, contracted while the United States exercised sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, to citizens of the Philippine Islands by way of pensions, retirement pay, and other similar benefits to which such citizens may be entitled on account of claims for service rendered to the government of the Philippine Islands and that may not have been definitely allowed or rejected prior to the withdrawal of United States sovereignty from the Philippine Islands and also on account of compensation or other benefits, based upon claims allowed prior to such withdrawal and pertaining to any period subsequent to such withdrawal: Provided, That the government of the Philippine Islands may make such equitable readjustment, of general application, of the amounts payable by it on account of the assumption of such obligations as the different standards of service compensation and living conditions in the Philippine Islands may justify: And provided further, That service of citizens of the Philippine Islands to the government of the Philippine Islands, during the period of United States sovereignty in the Philippine Islands, shall be reckoned as service to any independent government of the Philippine Islands that may be established pursuant to this act, in so far as regards the application of the pension, retirement, or similar laws that may be in effect at the time of the establishment of any such independent government of the Philippine Islands or that may be enacted thereafter by such government.

(9) That the debts and liabilities of the Philippine Islands, its provinces, cities, municipalities, and instrumentalities, which shall be valid and subsisting at the time of the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands, shall be assumed by the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands; and that where bonds have been issued, under authority of an act of Congress of the United States, by the Philippine Islands, or any province, city, or municipality therein, and where, under authority of an act of Congress of the United States, the government of the Philippine Islands has guaranteed the payment of interest or of principal, or of both interest and principal, on bonds of corporations, the Philippine government will make adequate provision for the necessary funds for the payment of interest and principal, and such obligations shall be a first lien on the taxes collected in the Philippine Islands.

(10) That the officials elected as provided for in section 6 of this act shall be constitutional officers of the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands and qualified to function in all respects as if elected directly under such government, and shall serve their full terms of office as prescribed in the constitution.

(11) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions of this section, except subsection (10), in a treaty with the United States.

SEC. 4. Should a constitution be drafted and approved by the Philippine Legislature pursuant to the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this act, it shall be duly certified and submitted by the said legislature to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands for transmission, within 30 days of its receipt by the Governor General, to the President of the United States, who shall determine whether or not it conforms with the provisions of this act. If the President finds that the proposed constitution conforms with the provisions of this act he shall so certify to the Governor General, who shall thereupon so advise the Philippine Legislature. If the President finds that the constitution does not conform with the provisions of this act he shall so advise the Governor General, stating wherein, in his judgment, the constitution does not so conform, and submitting provisions which will, in his judgment, make the constitution so conform. The Governor General shall, in turn, transmit such advice to the Philippine Legislature for appropriate further action by that body, pursuant to the same procedure hereinbefore prescribed, until the President and the legislature are in agreement: Provided, That should such an agreement not be reached within two years following the date of transmission by the Governor General to the Philippine Legislature of an advice of the President setting forth the statement and proposed constitutional provisions as above indicated, this section shall thereupon cease to be operative, and the President shall report the facts to the Congress as soon as practicable after the expiration of the said 2-year period.

SEC. 5. At any time within one year following the receipt by the Philippine Legislature from the Governor General of the advice communicating the fact that the President of the United States has certified that the constitution conforms with the provisions of this act the Philippine Legislature may provide for the submission of such certified constitution to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection in an election at which the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall have an opportunity to vote directly for or against such proposed constitution. The said election shall be held at such date and in such manner as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which the return of the election shall be made: Provided, That the date of such election shall be not earlier than four months after the date of receipt by the legislature from the Governor General of the advice communicating the fact of the certification by the President of the United States of the proposed constitution, nor earlier than the beginning of the twentieth year from and after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act become effective, and shall be not later than the end of the said twentieth year, unless the date of receipt by the Philippine Legislature from the Governor General of the said advice shall be after the beginning of the said twentieth year, in which case the Philippine Legislature may fix the date for the election at any time not earlier than four months nor later than one year after the date of such receipt by it of the said advice. The Philippine Legislature shall by law provide for the canvassing of the return and shall certify the result of said vote to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, such certification to include a statement of the votes cast for and against the constitution and to be accompanied by a certified copy of the constitution voted upon at the election. The Governor General shall, within 30 days after the receipt by him of such certification, transmit the same to the President of the United States, together with the certified copy of the constitution submitted by the Philippine Legislature.

SEC. 6. If a majority of the votes cast at the election are in favor of the ratification of the proposed constitution previously certified by the President of the United States for a free, independent, and sovereign government of the Philippine Islands, the Governor General shall, in that event, within 30 days after receipt of the certification from the Philippine Legislature of the result of the vote as prescribed in section 5, issue a proclamation for the election of officers of the government of the Philippine Islands provided for in the constitution. The election shall take place not earlier than three months nor later than six months after the proclamation by the Governor General ordering such election. When the election of the officers provided for under the constitution has been held and the results thereof determined, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall certify the results of the election to the President of the United States. The President of the United States shall thereupon issue a proclamation fixing a date, not more than six months after the date of such proclamation, for the complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands except as otherwise provided in section 15 of this act. Upon the date so fixed the previously existing Philippine Government shall terminate and the new government shall enter upon its rights, privileges, powers, and duties, as provided under the constitution, the orderly transfer of the functions of government being effected under appropriate directions to be issued by the President, who shall also arrange for the transfer to the independent government of the Philippine Islands of all immovable property of the United States in the Philippine Islands, except such as may be retained by the United States pursuant to the provisions of section 15 of this act: Provided, That upon the establishment of the independent government of the Philippine Islands the President is authorized to cause to be discharged from the military and naval services of the United States all citizens of the Philippine Islands who may not previously have been separated from such services.

SEC. 7. (a) In case no proposed constitution for a free, independent, and sovereign government of the Philippine Islands should be certified and submitted by the Philippine Legislature to the Governor General pursuant to section 4 of this act, and before the end of the eighteenth year after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act become effective; or, in case such a proposed constitution should be certified and submitted by the Philippine Legislature as provided in the said section 4 and before the end of the said eighteenth year, but certification thereof be withheld by the President of the United States due to failure of the President and the Philippine Legislature to reach an agreement within the 2-year period stated in the proviso contained in the said section 4; or, in case the Philippine Legislature should fail to provide for the submission of the proposed constitution for ratification or rejection by vote of the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands in accordance with the provisions set forth in section 5 of this act; or, in case the Philippine Legislature should fail duly to certify the result of said vote to the Governor General within three months after the date of the election at which said vote may be taken; or, in case a majority of the votes cast as provided in section 5 of this act should not be in favor of the ratification of the proposed constitution, previously certified by the President of the United States and submitted to the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands pursuant to the said section 5; then, in any one of the above cases, and in any other case that does not involve substantial compliance with the conditions imposed by sections 5 and 6 of this act, no further effect shall be given to the unexecuted provisions of the said sections 5 and 6, but, instead, the President of the United States shall be duly advised by the Governor General of the essential facts and shall thereupon issue a proclamation reciting such facts; and, effective 30 days after the date of such proclamation, and until otherwise provided by Congress, trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be as provided in section 9 of this act except that the amounts of sugar, coconut oil, and all yarns, twines, cords, cordage, rope, and cables, tarred and untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila hemp (abaca) or other hard fibers, permitted to come into the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty, shall be 40 per cent less than the amounts of such articles permitted to come into the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of the said section 9. From and after the date of such proclamation the government of the Philippine Islands shall continue as provided by the laws in effect at the date when such proclamation may be issued except as they may thereafter be duly altered or repealed. The President of the United States shall, as soon after the proclamation as may be practicable, report the facts to Congress for such action as it may then see fit to take.

SEC. 8. (a) Effective 60 days after the enactment of this act—

(1) For the purposes of the immigration act of 1917, the immigration act of 1924 (except sec. 13 (c)), this section, and all other laws of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens, citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall be considered as if they were aliens. For such purposes the Philippine Islands shall be considered as a foreign country and shall have for each fiscal year a quota of 100. This paragraph shall not apply to a person coming or seeking to come to the Territory of Hawaii who does not apply for and secure an immigration or passport visa.

(2) Citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall not be admitted to the continental United States from the Territory of Hawaii (whether entering such Territory before or after the effective date of this section) unless they belong to a class declared to be nonimmigrants by section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 or to a class declared to be nonquota immigrants under the provisions of section 4 of such act other than subdivision (c) thereof, or unless they were admitted to such Territory under an immigration visa. The Secretary of Labor shall by regulations provide a method for such exclusion and for the admission of such excepted classes.

(3) Any Foreign Service officer may be assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands, under a commission as a consular officer, for such period as may be necessary and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, during which assignment such officer shall be considered as stationed in a foreign country; but his powers and duties shall be confined to the performance of such of the official acts and notarial and other services which such officer might properly perform in respect of the administration of the immigration laws if assigned to a foreign country as a consular officer as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

(b) The provisions of this section are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws not inapplicable shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this section. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this section, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this section.

(c) Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this section, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act.

SEC. 9. Not later than six months after receipt by the President of the United States of the acceptance, as provided in section 21 of this act, of the provisions of this act the President shall issue a proclamation announcing such acceptance, and for a period of five years from and after the 1st of January next following the date of such proclamation trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be regulated as now provided by law, subject to the following exceptions:

(a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all refined sugars in excess of 50,000 long tons, and on unrefined sugars in excess of 800,000 long tons, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(b) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(c) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all yarn, twine, cord, cordage, rope, and cable, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila hemp (abaca) or other hard fibers coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of a collective total of 6,000,000 pounds of all such articles hereinbefore enumerated, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(d) In the event that in any year the limit in the case of any article which may be exported to the United States free of duty shall be reached by the Philippine Islands, the amount or quantity of such articles produced or manufactured in the Philippine Islands thereafter that may be so exported to the United States free of duty shall be allocated, under export permits issued by the government of the Philippine Islands, to the producers or manufacturers of such articles proportionately on the basis of their exportation to the United States in the preceding year; except that in the case of unrefined sugar the amount thereof to be exported annually to the United States free of duty shall be allocated to the sugar-producing mills of the islands proportionately on the basis of their production in the preceding year, and the amount of sugar which may be exported from each mill shall be allocated between the mill and the planters on the basis of the proportion of sugar received by the planters and the mill from the planters' cane, as provided in their milling contract. The government of the Philippine Islands is authorized to adopt the necessary laws and regulations for putting into effect the allocation hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 10. (a) In case that, during the fifth year from and after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act may become effective, the Philippine Legislature should, by a majority vote in both branches, petition for a decrease in the amount of articles permitted to come into the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty pursuant to the provisions of section 9, the President of the United States shall so announce by proclamation and, thereafter, during the sixth, seventh, and eighth years from and after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act may become effective, trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be as provided in the said section 9, except that the amounts of sugar, coconut oil, and all yarns, twines, cords, cordage, rope, and cables, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila hemp (abaca) or other hard fibers, permitted to come into the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty, shall be 10 per cent less than the amounts of such articles permitted to come into the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of the said section 9.

SEC. 15. (a) Unless section 2 of this act shall previously have ceased to be operative the President of the United States shall, during the first 10 days of the regular session of Congress next following the beginning of the seventeenth year from and after the date when the trade relations prescribed in section 9 of this act may become effective, report to Congress what lands and waters, if any, should, in his opinion, be retained by the United States for military and naval purposes and be withdrawn from the territory subject to any independent government of the Philippine Islands which may be established pursuant to this act. At any time subsequent to the close of the said session of Congress and prior to the establishment of an independent government of the Philippine Islands as provided in section 6 of this act, the President is authorized to declare, by proclamation, any lands and waters previously indicated by him for retention in the report rendered pursuant to this subsection to be the property in perpetuity of the United States and subject to the exclusive jurisdiction thereof, unless Congress shall meanwhile have provided otherwise, in which case any such reservation of lands and waters proclaimed by the President shall conform to the authorization of Congress.

(b) The report called for by subsection (a) of this section shall also set forth any immovable property of the United States, located in the Philippine Islands and not included within the limits of the lands and waters recommended for reservation by proclamation of the President as provided in the said subsection (a), which, in the opinion of the President, should be retained for the use of the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States and for the use of any other services of the several executive departments of the Government of the United States. The said report shall likewise set forth any immovable property of the United States, included within the limits of the lands and waters indicated for retention by the United States under subsection (a) of this section, and which should, in the opinion of the President, be retained by the United States in case the said lands and waters within the limits of which such immovable property is included, or any part of said lands and waters, should not be withdrawn from the territory subject to any independent government of the Philippine Islands established pursuant to this act and be retained under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

In so far as may be practicable, any questions that may arise, or may appear likely to arise, reference the ownership of any of the property to which this subsection refers, shall be adjusted prior to the submission of the report of the President.

Unless Congress shall meanwhile direct otherwise the President is authorized to declare, by proclamation issued at the time stated in subsection (a) of this section, all or any of the immovable property of the United States, previously recommended, in his report, for retention as indicated in this subsection, to be the property of the United States and reserved exclusively for its purposes and uses.

SEC. 16. That the bonds and other obligations of the Philippine government or of the provincial and municipal governments thereof, hereafter issued during the continuance of United States sovereignty in the Philippine Islands, shall specifically provide that there is no obligation, moral or legal, on the part of the United States to meet the interest or principal of such bonds or obligations: Provided, That such bonds and obligations hereafter issued shall not be exempt from taxation in the United States or by authority of the United States: And provided further, That no such obligations shall be contracted in foreign countries without the prior approval of the President of the United States, nor shall the proceeds of any such obligations contracted in foreign countries be applied, without such approval, to purposes other than the retirement of existing obligations of the Philippine government, or the provincial and municipal governments thereof, heretofore issued under authority of some act of Congress of the United States.

SEC. 17. Effective as of the date when an independent government of the Philippine Islands may enter upon its rights, privileges, powers, and duties as provided in section 6 of this act, all laws of the United States having in contemplation the Philippine Islands as territory subject to the jurisdiction of the United States are, in so far as such laws affect statutes of the United States of general application, hereby repealed: Provided, That this section shall not apply to such lands and waters of the Philippine Islands, if any, as may be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the government of the Philippine Islands pursuant to the provisions of section 15 of this act.

SEC. 18. Subsequent to the establishment of an independent government of the Philippine Islands as provided in section 6 of this act, and until Congress may otherwise direct, all executive and judicial powers necessary for the government and administration of such territory, if any, as may be retained by the United States under the provisions of section 15 of this act shall be vested in such person or persons, and be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States may direct: Provided, That unless Congress shall meanwhile otherwise direct, trade relations between such territory and the United States shall be regulated as provided in section 301 of the tariff act of 1930.

SEC. 19. Upon the proclamation and recognition of the independence of the Philippine Islands under their constitution, the President shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof and invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 20. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, except as provided in section 18 of this act, the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries: Provided, That if the President shall certify to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, as provided in section 4 of this act, a proposed constitution for an independent government of the Philippine Islands, he shall arrange for the holding, as soon as practicable after such certification, of a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and of the then existing government of the Philippine Islands, respectively, for the purpose of formulating a report, together with appropriate recommendations, regarding the trade relations between the Government of the United States and any independent government of the Philippine Islands that may be established pursuant to this act, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States with a view to transmission of the resulting report and recommendations to Congress and to the Legislature of the Philippine Islands, respectively, prior to any vote that may be taken, as provided in section 5 of this act, for the ratification or rejection of a proposed constitution for an independent government of the Philippine Islands; but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to the establishment of an independent government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 21. The foregoing provisions of this act shall not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. KING. May I state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that a number of years ago when the first Philippine independence bill was introduced, as I recollect, there was contemporaneously submitted in the Senate a resolution asking the President of the United States, unless independence were granted to the Filipinos in advance, to take the matter up with all the powers having interests in the Pacific, with a view to negotiating a treaty that would neutralize the Philippines and recognize their territorial integrity and political independence. A similar resolution is now before the committee. I have offered such a resolution at every session of Congress for the last 8 or 10 years.

I may add that, while I do not want to betray any confidence, a number of powers have been approached with reference to such a resolution, and all have signified, as I am advised, their perfect willingness to enter into such a treaty. Japan has never exhibited the slightest imperialistic attitude toward the Philippines. The Senator may know that there are only six or seven thousand Japanese in the islands.

Mr. REED. About three centuries ago the Japanese did have an expeditionary force in one of the northern islands, but they withdrew it of their own accord.

Mr. KING. That is true. The climatic conditions are not at all hospitable to the Japanese. They have had the utmost difficulty in settling their own territory of Formosa and only two or three hundred thousand Japanese are there.

With all the opportunities which the Japanese have had to settle the Philippine Islands they have made no effort in that direction. So there has been no inclination whatever upon their part to invade the Philippine Islands, and the Philippine Islands as an independent nation would not be in jeopardy at the hands of the Japanese.

Mr. REED. I quite agree with the Senator in that respect.

The Senator from Michigan has shown great foresight, it seems to me, in anticipating most of the serious problems that are connected with the Philippine independence idea, such as the Filipino debts, for which we are morally responsible, and matters of that sort; and it seems to me that likewise these military matters deserve consideration and ought to be taken into account in whatever bill we finally shall adopt on this subject.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania did not wrongly construe the statement I made a few moments ago. A declaration of neutrality would be the most desirable thing in the world at this time, and I am sure that it could be brought about. The point I wanted to emphasize was that we can not make it a condition precedent, because if we did that any one of the nations might prevent independence. I am, however, entirely in sympathy with the Senator's thought, and I think it ought to be embodied in the bill.

I wish to invite the Senator's attention to a very interesting situation in the Philippines.

In 1922 we entered into a 4-power treaty with Japan, Great Britain, and France. Paragraph (3), Article XIX, of this treaty enumerated the insular territories and possessions of Japan in the Pacific Ocean, as "The Kurile Islands, the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Loochoo Islands, Formosa, and the Pescadores, and any insular territories or possessions in the Pacific Ocean which Japan may hereafter acquire." Then in the same article and paragraph it was declared:

> The maintenance of the status quo under the foregoing provisions implies that no new fortifications or naval bases shall be established in the territories and possessions specified, that no measures shall be taken to increase the existing naval facilities for the repair and maintenance of naval forces, and that no increase shall be made in the coast defenses of the territories and possessions above specified. This restriction, however, does not preclude such repair and replacement of worn-out weapons and equipment as is customary in naval and military establishments in time of peace.

Apparently the American Government had as its motives for calling the conference from which this treaty emerged, first, the desire to establish the principle of limitation by international agreement; second, the hope of equalizing, to an extent, the British and American Navies; and third, the wish to initiate the ratio principle in naval construction. But whatever may have been the prospects of advantage for us and the world in general, the outcome is that Japan has immediate control of the Asiatic side of the Pacific. Army officers of experience agree that the treaty prevents us from increasing our fortifications in the Philippines. Without such defenses our retention of the islands could not be assured—in a conflict with a great power—except by a tremendous expenditure of money and blood.

Under this treaty we can not build, without violating our obligation, a fortification of any kind, not even a concrete trench. We can not so much as replace obsolete guns with those of a larger caliber. In short, we can do nothing in the matter of increased efficiency, except to substitute new guns for old, and then only if the substitutes do not exceed their predecessors in the caliber or the efficiency of those of 1922, when the treaty was signed. By the terms of this treaty we have abandoned, from both a naval and a military standpoint, the chief means of effective resistance in the Philippines. We reserved from the agreement limiting fortifications all the coasts of continental United States and those of Hawaii, but so far as the Philippines are concerned, and as respects improvements, we have bargained to stand still on the spot we occupied in 1922. Army officers know that we could not for any considerable time halt an invasion of the Philippines by a first-class power of the Orient unless we maintained permanently in the islands a mobile army of 60,000—one-half the size of our present standing Army. We could defend Corregidor against attacks from the sea, but it would be possible to place guns back of Mariveles, unless the kind of army I mentioned were on hand to forestall such a flanking of our batteries. Manila has no defensive works, and under the treaty we can not now erect any there.

The northernmost part of the Philippine Islands is only 65 miles from the southernmost point of Formosa, a possession of Japan—one which she took from China in 1895. Our Army and Navy in the Philippines are 7,000 miles from our Army base and 5,000 miles from Pearl Harbor, in Hawaii. Our nearest base would, therefore, be Pearl Harbor. The effective cruising distance for naval vessels without transport service for refueling is 2,000 miles. A map prepared by the Geographic Society divides the Pacific Ocean into zones represented by different colors. The Japanese zone extends to the north, to the east, and partly to the south of the Philippines. There is an American zone surrounding the Hawaiian Islands, but it is not connected; there is no passageway marked out or designated for the United States between the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands.

It may be said that, as a step toward disarmament, the 4-power treaty was wise and salutary, but its effect certainly has been to expose the Philippine Islands. The conditions imposed on us render the usefulness of our Army in case of an invasion very dubious. We could not hold them against a powerful nation. To lose them to a foreign foe would inflame all America. Our people would never be satisfied until they were recaptured.

The Philippines are, therefore, from a military point of view, perhaps the weakest spot in our armor. Corregidor could hold Manila Bay and protect the naval approaches to the metropolis, if the defenders could be provisioned with food and ammunition, but there could be little hope of safeguarding even Manila from a military attack by land. Corregidor is the one spot in the Philippines we could defend and hold for any considerable period in the face of a powerful enemy, but we should be obliged to relinquish it also if it were cut off from military reenforcements from the United States. Dewey, as we recall, having destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay and the fortifications on shore, still was compelled to wait three months for the arrival of American troops before he and the commander of our Army could take the city.

I do not think a member of our committee, after carefully investigating this subject, believes that there is the slightest possible danger of Japan attempting to enter the Philippines, and I agree with the Senator entirely on that point. Of course, the President of the United States could make a request for neutrality and it would be granted.

Mr. President, just one other observation and I am through. Some reference was made by the Senator from Michigan to the administration of the War Department. The United States is the only Nation with colonies whose administration is under a War Department. England, with her far-flung empire, has civil government everywhere; so has France; so has Holland; so has Spain. The only country in the world whose war department is dominant over civil affairs in colonial matters is the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. HAWES. If the Senator will let me conclude, then I will yield. I do not say that as a criticism, but it is because all our Presidents have considered our occupancy of the islands as temporary that no change in the form of administration has been made, and Congress has not made the change because independence has been promised the Philippine people, and there was no great necessity for making the change until it was done completely. The fact remains, however, that our country, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is singular in that respect; and there is a bill now pending in our committee, introduced by the distinguished chairman of the committee, to take the jurisdiction of the Philippines away from the War Department and give it either to the State Department or the Department of the Interior. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, our War Department is unlike the similar department of any other country. A very large portion of the activities of the American War Department are purely civilian in nature. The great engineering works on rivers and harbors are in charge of our War Department, as are the great works in the way of flood control in our interior valleys, the operation of the Panama Canal, and all that sort of thing, which are not military activities; they are wholly civilian, and so it is natural that we in America should not associate any military activity with our occupancy of the Philippines merely because it is the War Department that has charge of it. I think that deserves to be said.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is correct except in one particular. The War Department, in the case of flood control, has jurisdiction because of the Army engineers who are experts in such matters. The same thing is true of the Panama Canal, where we have employed the Army engineers to great advantage, as in connection with some other works; but in Panama we have a civilian governor, and, while we have a civilian governor in the Philippines, $70,000,000 is expended under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department.

I have looked into the matter rather carefully, and while the qualifications the Senator makes are entirely true, and to the credit of the Army, still I can make the statement again that the only nation in the world whose war department directs in any way the civil government or has anything to do with the civil government of its colonies is the War Department of the United States of America.

I have prepared an analysis of the substitute bill offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], which I ask leave to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ANALYSIS OF THE VANDENBERG SUBSTITUTE

A bill to authorize a more autonomous government for the people of the Philippine Islands, to regulate trade relations and immigration between those islands and the United States, to provide for the future political status of the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes

The title of the bill describes the different subjects covered by its provisions. These I examine consecutively.

"1. To authorize a more autonomous government for the people of the Philippine Islands."

In the interval before final withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands—a period of 20 years—the bill contemplates certain changes in the Jones Act by amending sections 22 and 23. The amendment to the organic act, in the language of its author, has for its purpose the establishment of a "legislative cabinet." It provides that the appointment of the heads of the executive departments be made upon the recommendation of the president of the senate—the leader of the majority party in the legislature—after each general election. This provision merely legalizes a practice already in existence.

The amendment also provides: (1) That the selection of a new president of the senate shall provoke a reconstitution of the cabinet, the new department heads to be appointed upon the recommendation of the new senate president. (2) That membership in the legislature shall not be a bar to appointment as head of an executive department. (There is no such positive provision in the Jones Act, although there is a precedent for such appointment. (3) That the President of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives, together with the heads of the executive departments, shall be members of the cabinet of the Governor General. (This provision merely sanctions the present "council of state" created by executive order of the Governor General as a clearing house for legislative and executive views on important questions of policy.) (4) That the president of the senate shall be designated to act as Governor General in the case of the temporary removal, resignation, or disability of both the Governor General and the vice governor, or their temporary absence. (This provision merely designates the president of the senate as acting Governor General instead of the Filipino heads of departments as provided by the Jones Act.)

The Vandenberg bill does not in any way enlarge Philippine autonomy under the Jones Act; it maintains the same constitutional demarcations of governmental power and authority among the different branches of the government. The limitations on Philippine autonomy are not removed or altered. The Governor General continues as chief executive clothed with the same administrative and legislative powers as under the existing law. The dual responsibility in the government, the one assumed by the Governor General and the other Filipino officials, subsists. Undoubtedly, certain political implications may arise from the establishment of the so-called legislative cabinet; however, the bill does not in any way expressly enlarge the powers of the legislature or diminish the authority of the Governor General. In fact, the power of "supervision and control" over the executive departments lodged in the Governor General is confirmed and strengthened, for the provision of the Jones Act conferring upon the legislature the power to reorganize the executive departments and to provide for the appointment and removal of the department heads is subjected to a new limitation, namely, "that nothing in this section or in any law of the Philippine government enacted pursuant thereto shall limit the power of the Governor General to remove for cause the head of any executive department."

It is clear, therefore, that this substitute bill, even as a charter of autonomy, does not grant to the Filipino people any enlargement of the governmental powers which they now exercise. It could be said truthfully that the bill merely gives legal approval to certain democratic practices which have grown up under the present organic act. But in practically all other respects American control of the Philippine government is to continue unaltered. The Governor General is not to be elected by the Philippine people; he will continue to be appointed by the President of the United States. The vice governor, the insular auditor, and the deputy insular auditor, as well as the members of the Insular Supreme Court, are to remain presidential appointees. The power of the Governor General over the executive departments, his unlimited authority to direct and control them, his power to make appointments, his practically absolute veto power, which includes the right to veto separate items of appropriation bills and to revive corresponding items of the appropriation act of the previous year—none of these powers suffers the least curtailment.

"2. To regulate trade relations."

The bill provides, in section 21, that its provisions shall not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature. The bill further provides that within six months after receipt by the President of the United States of the notification of acceptance the President shall issue a proclamation announcing such acceptance. The provisions of the bill governing trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands begin to take effect from the 1st day of January next following the date of such proclamation. The period after which the constitution for an independent government is to be formulated is also reckoned from that date.

The provisions relating to trade relations are as follows:

(a) For a period of five years trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be regulated as now provided by law (free trade), subject to the following exceptions:

(1) Full duty shall be levied on refined sugar coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 50,000 long tons and on unrefined sugars in excess of 800,000 long tons.

(2) Full duty shall be levied on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons.

(3) Full duty shall be levied on all yarn, cordage, etc., coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 6,000,000 pounds.

(These limitations are identical with those of the Hawes-Cutting bill, excepting on cordage. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides 3,000,000 pounds limitation.)

(b) Upon the petition of the Philippine Legislature (approval of the Governor General not required), approved during the fifth year, the limits of free imports specified in subsections (1), (2), and (3), by proclamation of the President of the United States, are reduced by 10 per cent, effective during the sixth, seventh, and eighth years.

(c) Upon a similar petition of the Philippine Legislature during the eighth year, by presidential proclamation, the limits of free imports specified in subsections (1), (2), and (3) are reduced by 20 per cent, effective during the ninth, tenth, and eleventh years.

(d) Upon a similar petition of the Philippine Legislature during the eleventh year, by presidential proclamation, the limits of free imports specified in subsections (1), (2), and (3) are reduced by 30 per cent, effective during the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth years.

(e) Upon a similar petition of the Philippine Legislature during the fourteenth year, by presidential proclamation, the limits of free imports specified in subsections (1), (2), and (3) are reduced by 40 per cent, effective during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth years.

(f) Upon a similar petition of the Philippine Legislature during the seventeenth year, by presidential proclamation, the limits of free imports specified in subsections (1), (2), and (3) are reduced by 50 per cent, effective during the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth years.

(g) In the event that the Philippine Legislature shall not petition as provided in sections (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f), trade relations and limitations shall be as existing at the time of such failure, until further action by Congress.

(h) If after the effectiveness of any additional reduction of limits of free imports as provided in sections (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f), the Philippine Legislature at any time during the three years of its effectiveness should "petition for a withdrawal of such limitations," said additional reduction, by presidential proclamation, shall be canceled, and in such case trade relations and the amount of limitation shall revert to the status existing during the period immediately preceding that in which such petition of withdrawal was made.

(i) In the event that the right of petition mentioned in section (h) is exercised by the Philippine Legislature in any one instance, then all the provisions of the bill contemplating subsequent action, including the grant of independence, become inoperative. The same thing occurs if the Philippine Legislature, in any one instance, should fail to petition for additional reduction of the amount of free imports as specified in sections (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f).

These provisions governing trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands are highly unjust and discriminatory, injurious to Philippine economic interests, and cruel to the Filipino people. For a period of 20 years the Philippine Islands would be kept in a condition of continuous economic uncertainty, more acute and damaging than that which now exists. Their people would be plunged into constant political strife and turmoil. Certainly such proposed trade relations would not allow that period of quiet and stability necessary to permit the Philippine Islands gradually to prepare themselves for the changes which independence will bring about. It is also obvious that the proposed plan would be far from satisfactory to American producers, because it would leave exclusively to the Filipino people to decide what the trade relations between the United States and the Philippines should be.

In 1909, when free trade between the United States and the Philippines was proposed, the plan met with the opposition of the representatives of the Filipino people. Despite their protest, Congress placed them within the American tariff wall. In this manner they were forced to rely on the American free market. For a generation Philippine industries and trade have grown on the basis of free trade with the United States. Most of those industries, and to a large extent the trade of the Philippine Islands with us, depends upon the continuance of that free-trade arrangement. To cut off the Philippine Islands from the American free market without giving them a reasonable opportunity to adjust themselves to the change would ruin many of their basic industries and destroy American trade with them. Such results can not but react seriously upon social conditions in the islands. Not fewer than 2,000,000 Filipinos are dependent on the sugar industry alone.

Practically every bill presented before the Congress looking to Philippine independence prescribes a period of transition before independence. The Hawes-Cutting bill, as reported out by the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, provides a period of 15 years; the Vandenberg substitute proposes a period of 20 years. The evident purpose of such transitional period is to allow the Filipino people to exercise self-government and to afford them an opportunity to adjust their economic, social, and political conditions to the changes that must occur upon the advent of independence. The aim is not to destroy the progress or the economic structure of the Philippines, but, rather, to prevent injury to the country and its economic interests through abrupt and violent changes.

It is essential to examine whether the Vandenberg bill reasonably complies with the duty of the United States to grant to the Philippine Islands that period of preparation to which they are entitled, prior to the imposition of the American tariff.

For the first five years the Vandenberg bill establishes practically the same trade arrangements as the Hawes-Cutting bill, including the limitations on the volume of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage which can annually be imported duty free. After five years these amounts of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage permitted to enter free of duty are progressively reduced by 10 per cent every three years. The pertinent question is: Can the Philippine sugar, coconut oil, and cordage industries adjust themselves in five years by lowering production costs, so that at the end of such period they may be able to absorb the payment of full duty on a progressively increasing proportion of their yearly output?

The evidence adduced at the hearings shows that such period is not sufficient. At least 10 years is considered necessary. This is especially true as regards the sugar industry. The Philippine sugar industry is many years behind that of Cuba, Java, or Hawaii in the successful application of the results of scientific research, discovery, and experimentation.

But these provisions of the Vandenberg bill are more objectionable from another viewpoint. They compel the Philippine people, through their representatives in the legislature, every three years, by their own action, to further restrict their free exports to the United States. If for any cause, whether within or beyond their control, they should fail to do so, they will be forced to live under economic conditions highly hurtful to them, and, more important, their failure is to be considered as an admission of economic incapacity and used as an excuse to permanently withhold their independence. Such exaction is neither equitable nor honorable from the viewpoint of American justice. Rather than subject the Philippine nation to that torture, it would be preferable for their own good to turn them loose immediately and permit them to shift for themselves.

If it is the purpose of this plan of progressive increase of limitations to compel Philippine industries gradually to absorb the American tariff which they shall have to meet after independence, that end is reached more effectively and justly under the plan proposed in the Hawes-Cutting bill.

For 10 years Philippine sugar, coconut oil, and cordage are limited by the Hawes-Cutting bill to their estimated volume of imports into the United States as of the year 1932. After the expiration of that 10-year period the Hawes-Cutting plan imposes a tariff in the nature of an export duty on those and other articles entering the United States free of duty beginning from the eleventh year at the rate of 5 per cent of the American tariff, increasing yearly by 5 per cent up to 25 per cent at the end of the 15-year period. The Hawes-Cutting bill is fair both to the Philippines and to the United States. While protecting Philippine industries, at the same time it gradually applies to them the American tariff.

The trade provisions of the Vandenberg bill are unjust and discriminatory in another respect. As has been stated, while the Hawes-Cutting bill maintains the status quo as to the volume of free imports into the United States from the Philippine Islands for 10 years, the Vandenberg bill proposes to reduce that volume until it falls to 50 per cent of the original amount. While this process takes place American exports to the Philippine Islands are neither reduced nor limited in any way.

At the end of 10 years, whereas the volume of American exports to the Philippines may have increased to a total much above the present figures, Philippine free imports into the United States shall be reduced to 80 per cent of the present volume, and during the eighteenth year such free imports shall be reduced to 50 per cent.

"3. To provide for the future political status of the Philippine Islands."

The bill authorizes the Philippine Legislature, at any time during the eighteenth year, to formulate a constitution for a free, independent, and sovereign government of the Philippine Islands. The constitution must include provisions to the following effect:

(1) Recognition of American sovereignty over territory reserved by the President for military and naval purposes.

(2) Recognition of property rights of the United States over immovable property belonging to the United States and reserved by the President for American use.

(3) Assumption by independent Philippines of all debts and obligations of the present government.

(4) Recognition of validity of all acts of the United States in the Philippine Islands during its sovereignty.

(5) Recognition of property rights of the United States in the Philippine Islands, and obligation to safeguard same.

(6) Protection of existing property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States, and all such rights as may hereafter be acquired by them to the same extent as property rights of Philippine citizens.

This provision would create permanently in favor of American citizens and corporations a preferred status not to be enjoyed by other foreign citizens or corporations. Such a condition would greatly embarrass the Philippines in its dealings with other nations. There can be no justification for the requirement that such preferential treatment be accorded American citizens and corporations as to "all such rights as may hereafter be acquired by them." It would be the cause of numerous interminable disputes. And this is proposed in the same bill that would deprive Filipinos of all privileges in the United States, including entry and residence.

(7) Assumption of continuing obligations of the United States under the treaty of Paris.

(8) Assumption of all obligations of the United States in favor of Philippine citizens for pensions, retirement pay, and other similar benefits.

(9) Provisions for payment of outstanding debts and liabilities of present government, and same shall be first lien on Philippine revenues.

(10) Recognition as constitutional officers of those elected pursuant to constitution.

(11) Obligation to embody foregoing provisions (except (10)) in treaty with United States.

The constitution so drafted shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, who shall determine whether or not it conforms to the provisions of the act. In this respect the Vandenberg bill's provisions are substantially the same as those of the Hawes-Cutting bill, with this exception: The Vandenberg bill provides that if the President does not reach an agreement with the Philippine Legislature within two years after transmission of his objections to the legislature, all further actions as to the constitution are suspended until Congress intervenes.

If the President certifies the constitution, the Philippine Legislature is empowered to provide for its submission to the Philippine people for ratification or rejection.

After the ratification of the constitution, the election of the officers of the government provided for in the constitution shall be held.

Upon receipt of the report of the Governor General announcing the results of the election, the President is to issue a proclamation fixing a date, not later than six months after such proclamation, for the complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands.

Other provisions relating to withdrawal and transfer of sovereignty are substantially identical with those of the Hawes-Cutting bill.

But under the Vandenberg bill, the independence of the Philippines shall not eventuate in the following cases:

(1) If the Philippine Legislature does not formulate a constitution during the eighteenth year.

(2) If the President of the United States does not certify the constitution within two years after transmission of his objections to the legislature.

(3) If the Philippine Legislature fails to provide for the submission of the constitution to the Philippine people for ratification.

(4) If the Philippine Legislature fails to certify to the Governor General the results of such election for the ratification of the constitution within three months thereafter.

(5) If the majority of the votes cast at such election is against the ratification of the constitution.

In any one of these cases the bill provides the President shall issue a proclamation reciting the facts, and, effective 30 days from such proclamation, and until otherwise provided by Congress, trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall revert to the basis effective during the first 5-year period, except that the amounts of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage permitted to come into the United States free of duty shall be reduced by 40 per cent.

As to the government of the Philippine Islands in any of the eventualities enumerated, the same shall continue as provided by laws in effect on the date of the proclamation of the President, and all the facts shall be reported by him to Congress for appropriate action.

Besides the 5 cases above mentioned, there are 10 other instances specified in the bill which would result in defeat of Philippine independence. These were noted in discussing the provisions concerning trade relations; however, their importance justifies a repetition at this point. The bill provides that further action in the process or procedure leading to Philippine independence and withdrawal of American sovereignty shall be suspended also in the following cases:

(1) If the Philippine Legislature during the fifth year should fail to petition for a decrease in the amount of limitations of duty-free sugar, coconut oil, and cordage.

(2) If after the fifth year and before the expiration of the eighth year the Philippine Legislature should petition for a withdrawal of such additional limitations on free imports.

(3) If the Philippine Legislature during the eighth year should fail to petition for a further decrease in the amount of limitations of duty-free sugar, coconut oil, and cordage.

(4) If after the eighth year and before the expiration of the eleventh year the Philippine Legislature should petition for a withdrawal of the additional limitations on free imports mentioned in subsection (3).

(5) If the Philippine Legislature during the eleventh year should fail to petition for a further decrease in the amount of limitations of duty-free sugar, coconut oil, and cordage.

(6) If after the eleventh year and before the expiration of the fourteenth year the Philippine Legislature should petition for a withdrawal of the additional limitations on free imports mentioned in subsection (5).

(7) If the Philippine Legislature during the fourteenth year should fail to petition for a further decrease in the amount of limitations of duty-free sugar, coconut oil, and cordage.

(8) If after the fourteenth year and before the expiration of the seventeenth year the Philippine Legislature should petition for a withdrawal of the additional limitations on free imports mentioned in subsection (7).

(9) If the Philippine Legislature during the seventeenth year should fail to petition for a still further decrease in the amount of limitations of duty-free sugar, coconut oil, and cordage.

(10) If after the seventeenth year and before the expiration of the twentieth year the Philippine Legislature should petition for a withdrawal of the additional limitations on free imports mentioned in subsection (9).

These provisions indicate the difficult ordeal imposed upon the Philippine people. It is rather a test of their patience and of the degree they are willing to suffer material losses than of either their ability or their patriotism. The best that can be said of this whole plan is that it provides a long, sinuous process leading to independence. So difficult would be compliance with the conditions imposed, that irrespective of the laudable purpose of the bill, its provisions would defeat rather than accomplish the independence of the Philippine people.

"4. To provide * * * for other purposes."

I. IMMIGRATION

The provisions of the Vandenberg bill relating to immigration during the transition period of 20 years are identical with those of the Hawes-Cutting bill, except that the Vandenberg bill makes its provisions effective 60 days after the passage of the act, whereas the corresponding provisions of the Hawes-Cutting bill go into effect upon the inauguration of the government of the Philippine commonwealth.

II. MILITARY AND NAVAL RESERVATIONS

Section 15 of the bill directs the President of the United States during the seventeenth year to report to Congress "what land and waters, if any, should, in his opinion, be retained by the United States for military and naval purposes." Unless Congress has meanwhile provided otherwise, the President, before withdrawal of American sovereignty, is authorized to declare, by proclamation, any lands and waters previously indicated by him to be "the property in perpetuity of the United States" and subject to the government, jurisdiction, and sovereignty thereof. This authority extends to any immovable property of the United States located in the Philippine Islands for the use of the diplomatic and consular or other service of the United States.

The bill does not provide any limitation as to the amount or kind of land or waters which may be reserved; the whole island of Mindanao, with an area as large as that of Indiana and more, could be retained. In fact, other things may result from this provision: The whole Philippine Archipelago may be retained by the United States, if in the opinion of the President that should be necessary for military or naval purposes. This authority, once exercised, binds the Philippine people by an engagement in their constitution (sec. 3 (1)) to recognize its validity. The Philippine people could not agree a priori to such a course. It would be most unwise for them to do so. And yet, unless they do agree and accept that stipulation in their constitution, they can not become independent.

It may be asserted that those reservations are to be limited to small portions of territory actually needed for military and naval purposes. While such is a reasonable assumption, the temptation to expand these reservations would be very great. No harm can come from keeping a large portion. So, why risk the chances of shortage in the future? The Filipino will have nothing to say. He will have agreed to it beforehand.

The express provisions of the bill indicate that no paltry portion of territory is contemplated. Rather, large areas of land inhabited by economically productive communities are in view. Two provisions of the bill suggest this conclusion:

(1) Section 18 provides that after independence has been granted to the Philippine Islands, and until Congress may otherwise direct, "all executive and judicial powers necessary for the government and administration of such territory * * * as may be retained by the United States * * * shall be vested in such person or persons * * * as the President of the United States may direct."

(2) Section 18 also provides: "That unless Congress shall meanwhile otherwise direct, trade relations between such territory and the United States shall be regulated as provided in section 301 of the tariff act of 1930" (free trade).

If these provisions mean anything, they mean that these territories will not be mere naval or military stations, but veritable colonial possessions, with a complete government having civil officials charged with the duty of dispensing justice, executing the laws, and administering public affairs.

Who will inhabit these territories? Only soldiers, marines, and other military and naval officials? Certainly not. A thriving and productive civilian community is contemplated. It will produce articles that will be admitted free of duty into the United States, and in turn will not levy a tariff on imports from America. The trade to be developed is important enough to merit legislation 20 years before the status which it seeks to regulate is created. These provisions are inconsistent with a just and earnest attempt to liberate the Philippine people.

III. TRADE RELATIONS AFTER INDEPENDENCE

The bill repeals all laws of the United States having in contemplation the Philippine Islands as a territory subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, effective upon the inauguration of the independent government of the Philippine Islands. It also provides that subsequent to the proclamation of independence tariff duties shall be levied and collected upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands as if the Philippine Islands were a separate and foreign country. This provision excepts such territories as are retained by the United States.

IV. TRADE CONFERENCE

The bill contains provisions substantially the same as those of the Hawes-Cutting bill regarding the holding of a conference of representatives of the United States and the Philippine Islands for the purpose of discussing and submitting recommendations concerning trade relations between the two countries after the recognition of Philippine independence.

EFFECTIVENESS OF THE ACT

The bill provides that its provisions shall not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature. This provision is inconsistent with section 8 which provides that the provisions regulating immigration shall take effect 60 days after the passage of the act.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously entered, until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 14, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1932

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Clerk, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Georgia offers the following resolution:

House Resolution 264

Resolved, That Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative from the State of Illinois, be, and he is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

Resolved, That the President and the Senate be notified by the Clerk of the election of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY as Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. I am only going to detain you a moment. Our able and beloved Speaker is unable to be present, as he is suffering with a very heavy cold and bronchitis. He is confined to his bed, and the House physician forbids his coming to the House.

I am happy to say that he is much better. [Applause.] The doctor is confident he can return to his duties about Thursday. The Speaker could designate a Speaker pro tempore; but if he did so some question might arise as to the authority of the Speaker pro tempore to appoint conference committees and to sign enrolled bills. At this stage of the proceedings of Congress it is necessary that conferences be speedily assembled, the conferees appointed, and enrolled bills signed. This is why it is necessary to offer this resolution.

I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore after Mr. CRISP administered the oath of office prescribed by law.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, this day may we make Thee our sovereign and the Republic our commonwealth. The mercy of Thy providence is ours, and yet we can not understand it; we claim it, for we are Thy earthly children. O give us Thy instruction and influence from on high. Bless us with the supreme sentiments of the soul, which are faith and hope. Do Thou enlarge and exalt the spheres of our lives. In the eyes of our countrymen our duty is sacred. May we look upon it, lift it, and bear it solemnly. O let the spirit of brotherhood throb in the realms of our souls. In these retreats no tempest is heard and no shock is felt. May our country be redeemed to patience, to quietude, and cooperation. Our Father, our solicitude and our prayer go out to Thee for our Speaker. May he be blest with great comfort, rest of mind and body, and with immediate recovery. In the adorable name of Jesus, our Elder Brother. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 11, 1932, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11361. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

THE WAGNER BILL

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There has been a considerable amount of inquiry as to whether or not the so-called Wagner bill has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been; it will be referred some time to-day.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to admonish the galleries that under the rule of the House expressions of approval or disapproval from the galleries are prohibited; and the Chair will enforce that ruling.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of House Resolution 220, and ask that it be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman sign the petition?

Mr. PATMAN. I did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of House Resolution 220. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 220, a resolution to make the bill H. R. 7726, to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, a special order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, the gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNING. With regard to the order of procedure, I would like to ask the Chair if it is not the procedure that there will be 10 minutes in favor of the motion to discharge the Rules Committee and 10 minutes against it in debate. A vote will then come on the motion to discharge the Rules Committee; and if that is favorable, a vote will immediately be had on the resolution from which the Rules Committee is discharged from consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. Should not the motion be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; just the title, under the rule; and the title has been read.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] dispense the time for the proponents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. I first want to speak of the parliamentary situation. The procedure here this morning is to discharge the Rules Committee from the consideration of what was originally known as the Patman bill. The Patman bill, together with some 13 others, were reported adversely from the Ways and Means Committee. A resolution was then introduced asking for a rule, which was referred to the Rules Committee.

At the proper time there will be an effort made by the friends of the bill to substitute for the Patman plan what is known as the Owen plan. This was the plan that 10 of us, members of the Ways and Means Committee, voted to report favorably as a substitute for the Patman plan.

The Owen plan is a program of controlled expansion of the currency. I think, if there is anything needed in this country to-day, it is an expansion of our currency. Under the Owen plan there is provided for the flotation of a bond issue equal to the amount of the adjusted-service certificates. This is held by the Federal reserve system until the dollar has reduced itself to 2 per cent below the standard it maintained in 1926. At that time the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to sell or dispose of as many of these bonds as will keep the dollar at a stabilized price. No interest on bonds is paid until, of course, they are sold.

I think if we do this we will accomplish three important purposes.

Remember, this does not take a penny out of the Treasury. Remember, these bonds that are put up here are put up in equal amount to the certificates that we owe the soldiers 13 years from now, and these bonds mature in 20 years and carry interest at the rate of 3½ per cent.

In the first place, the Government of the United States will discharge an obligation that it owes to the ex-service men in this country.

In the second place, Mr. Speaker, it is the best way of distributing funds that we can possibly undertake for the rehabilitation, or the rebuilding, of purchasing power in this country. I insert here the figures by counties in my own State. It would put this much new money into circulation in that State.

In the third place, it will reduce the present high price of the dollar with which American citizens are compelled to discharge their indebtedness.

I think, from the standpoint of a business proposition, the Owen plan, as suggested here, will do more to restore prosperity in this country than any other one thing. The Patman plan, for which it is going to be asked to substitute the Owen plan, is a plan which the 10 members of the minority did not think controlled the expansion of the currency.

I have consistently supported the immediate payment in cash of these adjusted-compensation certificates. While I favored paying this compensation in cash originally, we were not permitted to vote upon this question under the rules, and I therefore voted for the adjusted-compensation certificate, as shown on page 4444 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 18, 1924. When the President vetoed this bill I voted to override his veto, as shown on page 8814 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 17, 1924. I voted for the Johnson bill with the Rankin amendment, and voted to override the President's veto of this measure. I voted also for the disability allowance when it came up for passage. The last session I supported the hospitalization program, which gave Arkansas another veterans' hospital. This session I have voted for a pension to the widows and orphans of the ex-service men. It is true we can not pay these certificates from the Treasury, but we can pay them under the Owen plan, for which 11 of us voted in the Ways and Means Committee.

So in the vote that is coming, my friends, we are simply discharging the committee in order to get the ex-service men of this country a vote on this proposition. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] for 10 minutes in opposition to the motion.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes of the 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], to be disposed of as he sees fit.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in these few minutes I want, as a World War veteran, to emphasize the point that the Congress of the United States does not owe the able-bodied veterans a single penny at the present time, directly or indirectly, now or to-morrow, or until 1945, on their adjusted-service certificates.

The Congress of the United States has a very clear-cut and distinct duty to perform; to serve notice on all the veterans that we owe them nothing; that they were misinformed and badly advised in coming to Washington in mass formation; that there is not a ghost of chance of enacting a bonus bill into law during this economic crisis and national emergency, and that we do not propose to be coerced by any veterans in Washington or any other group in the United States. [Applause.]

The title of this bill should read:

A bill to print two billions of depreciated paper money, shove us off the gold standard, undermine public credit at home and abroad, destroy what remains of economic confidence, prolong both the depression and unemployment, undo all the efforts of the Government to balance the Budget, scrap all ideas of governmental economy, and bring ruin and disaster to the American people—

as was done in Germany, Russia, and other foreign nations where printing presses turned out vast quantities of worthless paper currencies. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I join with my comrade of the World War [Mr. FISH] in speaking briefly against this resolution.

We are not here to-day to decide the question of the inflation of the currency. We should settle that on its own merits. The cause of the World War veteran ought not to be used for that purpose. We are to-day to decide the question as to whether or not the Congress is going to vote to the World War men the payment of money from the Treasury that is not now due.

Three decisions ought to go out from this House to the country to-day. The first is that the Congress is not going to be compelled and can not be compelled by a show of force or numbers to act in behalf of and favorable to any group in the United States. [Applause.] The second is that our comrades, the men in the galleries and in the country, ought to know that no matter what the vote in this House may be to-day the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates should not and will not be made by this Congress. The third is that our comrades in the galleries and the veterans in the country ought to know that this movement to pay these certificates now is doing more to harm the cause of the disabled and able-bodied veterans of the United States than anything that anybody could possibly propose that Congress do. The country is not going to stand forever the constant and incessant demands for increased payments and additional benefits from the Federal Treasury to veterans without regard to merit. The service men themselves ought to lead the movement to protect the taxpayer from any and every group which demands increased expenditures and largesses from Federal money. Every vote for this resolution is a vote to place in jeopardy every pension and compensation check sent out by the United States. We must, as service men, resist these movements. If we do not, the resentment of the country may be such as to take from deserving veterans that which we all now believe they should have. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU]. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the cause of the veterans must, in this instance, rest upon the theory that the payment of the bonus will be best for the welfare of the country.

I want to say that the men whom I know in this Congress who are sponsoring the payment of the balance due the World War veterans on their bonus certificates at this time are doing so because we are convinced that there is nothing else that this Congress could do that would have a better or more wholesome effect upon the entire country. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] stated that the proponents of this bonus plan, if their program became effective, would bring ruin and disaster on this country. I want to say to you, my friends, that ruin and disaster will be upon us unless we do something that will bring about some real relief. [Applause.]

The Patman bill, with the Owen amendment, would provide for the issuance of additional currency, the expansion of currency, with a check or brake on it, that would guarantee that commodity prices would not go higher than the average commodity prices of 1926, and would provide that in no instance would the purchasing value of the dollar go more than 2 per cent below the average purchasing value of the dollar in 1926.

I believe that if this money were put in circulation and spread, as it would be, in every nook and corner of the entire United States at the rate of about $18 per capita, immediately the people of this country would have an opportunity to not only buy the necessaries of life, but they would also have an opportunity to pay the grocer and the baker and to pay their debts and get money in circulation so that business would have a chance to revive. The passage of this bill will afford an opportunity to bring about an economic stability in our country.

I want to say to you that I know that the spirit of the ex-service men of this country is such that they are willing to do what is best for the country, but I maintain that the payment of this bonus, the discharge of this obligation to the men at this time, when the country is in such great need of having more money in circulation, is the best way we can help not only the veteran but all of the people with whom the veteran comes in contact.

I believe I can say without fear of successful contradiction that former Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, is one of the leading, if not the leading, monetary experts in this country. After giving about 40 years of study to monetary problems, and after studying this problem from every angle, he has come to the conclusion that an immediate expansion of currency is essential—not only desirable but essential—and he maintains that the passage of this bill would be the most effective way to get this money in circulation all over the country. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, there is not time at my disposal to attempt to reply to these spurious arguments made in behalf of this indefensible measure. Mr. Speaker, I find in this motion to discharge the application of blind force to constitutional government that is little less than revolution.

It is in obedience to the demands of duty, which Wordsworth once called the "stern daughter of the voice of God," that I take the floor, put on my shirt of fire, and in my feeble way try to stay this rising tide of fear that threatens to wash out the courage of men and endanger the safety of the Republic.

Is it true, Mr. Speaker, that each man kills the thing he loves? These, my countrymen, the representatives of the American people, will at least to-day by their votes make demonstrations of their beliefs.

What is this invitation to the House? Is it to destroy the integrity of its own creatures, two of its important committees, and produce a rent in the cloak of its parliamentary procedure through which wrong and abuse will ever find free access?

What is the crime for which the Committee on Rules stands arraigned? Nothing but obedience to the laws of this House; the refusal to displace right with wrong. What honorable man of this body—and all are honorable men—would, under similar circumstances, have dared stain his conscience with such infernal hue as breach of public trust?

But, gentlemen, say that the exigencies of the occasion demand the setting aside of the rules, and the rules will probably be set aside; but who expects members of the committee to flee when you, my colleagues, have placed them in the watchtower to protect you, and through you the American people, against the attack of the public enemy? Blast them out of the position which they have taken, and you would despise them had they taken any other; but, remember, you will have ravished yourselves away by a power that should have been resisted.

What has become of the courage of old? What man will rise and speak the language of Andrew Jackson, who once to a panic-stricken companion said, "You are uneasy; you never sailed with me before, I see." Is the threat that is being held over Congress driving the light out of the eyes of men and chilling their hearts with fear? Are gentlemen afraid to hazard their political fortunes for the good of the country? Let them remember that it is willingness to sacrifice and to die that makes men fit to serve.

The tragic part about this whole thing is that the soldier has been told that the Government owes him money that it will not pay, and in most instances he believes it. The fault is ours. Things said upon the floor of this House have filled his heart with a feeling of distrust, and he is made to despise the thing which he once so gloriously risked his life to save.

There is want and hunger everywhere, but is the plight of the soldier worse than that of others? Around three-quarters of a million of them now draw compensation. Near a half million or more are in the employ of the General Government and its subdivisions and are therefore supported at public expense, and the remainder have been officially determined to be in good health, and they are at the very peak of their productive capacity. If their condition is no worse than others, then why penalize the rest for their special good? Why should not all the needy share equally in the bounty of the Government?

Who gets the bonus? The rich as well as the poor, the self-sufficient as well as the needy. There is not a member of Edwin Markham's army of pale-faced children that outwatches the sun by day and the moon by night but whose condition will be made worse by the adoption of this proposed law. There is not a beggar that extends the hand of want but from whose tin cup there will be taken toll.

Go and pass this law, fill the soldiers' pockets with this new-made money, ground out of the toil of the poor as well as all others, but when he goes back home and passes down a back-alley street or out upon the public highway and sees standing in the doorway of a half-torn-down house a hollow-cheeked and sunken-eyed woman with four or five ragged and half-starved children tugging at her tattered dress, and sees her give to the mouth of a crying baby an empty and flabby breast, let him be reminded that to the new-made money that jingles in his pockets that mother and those children were made to contribute.

Mr. Speaker, this is no time to cringe, for men to freeze from fear. This is the time of trial, and who will flee from the ordeal or beg to be excused?

In this hour of stress all should be content to be tied together in a deep concern for the national good. What man has the right to advantage? All are under the same cloud of despair. We are in the same boat in the storm at sea. Safety is our promise, but each must take his turn at the oars. Mutiny is treason, and treason is death.

Let the roll be called, Mr. Speaker. This is the appointed hour. "The storm is up, and all is on the hazard." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, we have only one more speech.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this bill to pay over $2,400,000,000 to less than 4 per cent of the population of this country will not solve a single problem with which Congress and the country are confronted. [Applause.] With 8,000,000 unemployed men and women in this country, I for one refuse to sacrifice them for any such sordid, selfish purpose.

If the real purpose of this bill is an expansion of the currency, then I say it is unfair to make the veterans surrender their certificates for that expansion of the currency. In eight weeks after the bonus is paid the veterans will not have any money and the country will be in exactly the same condition as we are in now. What Congress must do is to provide work for the unemployed. I say, Mr. Speaker, that service to country in time of peace is often more difficult than in time of war, and now is the time for Congress to be real soldiers in this critical moment of stress and render real service to their country by courageously voting against this motion. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in the time allocated it is impossible to present a real argument on the merits of the proposition before us, and therefore, under leave granted to me, I shall insert the complete statement which I made on this subject before the Ways and Means Committee of the House:

STATEMENT OF THE HON. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 19, 1932

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to say that it is a rather novel situation for me to be opposing a bill sponsored by my best and closest legislative friends. I consider our colleague from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, one of the most promising of the younger statesmen. We have worked together on a great many important issues. I do not believe there is anyone to whom I have been closer legislatively than my good friend from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN. It is typical of the so-called independent or progressive to do his own thinking. If we were ready to go along, we would not be, perhaps, in a class by ourselves; and because we are that, we have become callous to abuse and being misunderstood, and we just keep on going along according to the dictates of our best judgment and our conscience.

Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions involved in this question of the cash payment of the bonus. One if whether or not the American people through Congress have properly provided and cared for the veterans of the World War; and I fear that in the course of the discussion of this bill, in the heat of debate and argument throughout the country, there may be in certain quarters a misapprehension that the people of this country have been unappreciative or have to a degree neglected the care of the veterans.

I do not think that is fair. I believe Congress in this instance has provided most generously for the care of the veterans: Of course, in dealing with 4,000,000 or more men, it is quite possible that there are individual cases that perhaps have received too generous treatment and individual cases here and there that might have been neglected, or not properly cared for. But, on the whole, I believe Congress has responded since 1919 to every demand, to every suggestion, to every request made by the veterans of the World War through their organizations.

The last bill that I voted for before leaving the House in 1917, was the war risk insurance bill. We thought at the time that the establishment of this insurance system would take care of the casualties, disabilities, and that we would embark upon such a system rather than to repeat the mistakes of the treatment accorded veterans of the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Civil War, and the Spanish-American War.

Grave mistakes were made in the treatment of veterans in the past. After the World War, there was a demand for vocational rehabilitation. I believe this committee had jurisdiction of the bills providing for that. In the enthusiasm, in the desire to properly care for and rehabilitate these young heroes, we spent over $600,000,000. The law was administered very generously. The benefit of the doubt was given to every applicant and it continued for a period of three or four years.

After that we sought to develop a system of hospitalization, which was followed by the first compensation act. I will not bore the committee with figures, but suffice it to say that over 313,700 veterans are, in various degrees, of course, now the beneficiaries of the existing law—from a slight degree of disability up to total.

In addition to that, last year we passed a new act allowing as much as $40 for disabilities not incurred in line of duty, not service connected. That was not a novel departure, by any means. It was novel as to the time, the short time, after the war provision for nonservice disabilities were made. If we take 1918, the end of 1918, as the end of the war, it followed 12 years after the war, while the first non-service-connected allowance made for veterans of the War of 1812 was enacted on February 14, 1871, 57 years after that war.

The first act granting compensation to disabled veterans of the Mexican War, not service connected, was 38 years after that war; as to the Civil War, 25 years, and the Spanish War, 31 years. They were included in the same act which granted compensation for non-service-connected disabilities to veterans of the World War.

It is true that in the construction of the various acts applicable to the Civil War veterans, they were very broad in their interpretations. But as far as Congress is concerned this great lapse of time to which I have referred existed before compensation was allowed for non-service-connected disabilities.

The question of pensions has been a very disturbing element in our legislative history from the days of the Revolution. In 1818 we had a situation very similar to this one in the case of the veterans of the Revolutionary War.

In 1789 by act of Congress the Federal Government assumed the payment of such Revolutionary War pensions as had been granted by the States, and this provision was continued by subsequent legislation. Later on, pensions were granted to widows of Revolutionary soldiers, and in 1861 the pension rolls contained the names of 63 survivors of that war and 2,728 widows. Total paid $70,000,000.

The 1818 pension law provided that every person who served in the Revolutionary Army through its close or for nine months during any part of the war and was "in need" should be pensioned. District judges heard applications and transmitted recommendations to the Secretary of War. By the middle of September the rush of applicants was so great that the War Department could not take care of them all. Flagrant abuses came to light and were the subject of severe newspaper comment. Expenditures increased from $200,000 to $300,000 per year to $2,000,000 to $300,000,000.

In 1819 there was a Government deficit and that made the situation more acute. When Congress met in December, 1819, the abuses of the service pension were properly brought to its attention. Secretary of War Calhoun admitted that in spite of every precaution his department had been imposed upon to a great extent. Congress ordered a roll of all pensioners to be published and set a committee to work investigating the situation in the spring of 1820. The most damning charge was that the rich took advantage of the act to cheat the Government out of money and that "many in the community less able to bear the burdens of government are compelled to pay heavy taxes to support their more opulent neighbors." So on May 1, 1820, Congress passed supplemental legislation requiring the filing of sworn schedules of property and a more certain showing of "need" in order to secure the pension. Thousands were stricken from the roll under this act. Many more failed to reply and many were rejected.

"The fact that there had been much fraud and imposition at the expense of the Government was clearly established."

It is interesting to note that the relief of veterans ran a little over $100,000 in Washington's administration, it varied from about $75,000 to $100,000 until we come to this period; and it was during Monroe's administration that it jumped right up to $3,000,000. Then, after the investigation to which I have just called attention, and the scandal which ensued, it came down to a normal of about $300,000 and then adjusted itself.

Now we come to the period 1829 to 1836, when there were added to that column the veterans of the War of 1812.

Mr. RAGON. You have been speaking here about the Revolutionary soldier?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; the veterans of the War of 1812 were added later to the pension rolls.

Mr. LEWIS. You did not include there the soldiers of 1812?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not in that period.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. May I say to the gentleman from New York that it is not necessary to yield until the gentleman has concluded his statement?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would prefer to continue uninterrupted, if I may, and then I shall be glad to answer questions.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. The rules of the House apply to these hearings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. February 14, 1871, was the first pension legislation concerning veterans of this war. Congress then granted a pension of $8 per month to the survivors of the War of 1812 who rendered a service of 60 days and to their widows provided they were married to such soldiers or sailors prior to the treaty of peace. The act of March 9, 1879, reduced the period of service to 14 days and made no limitation as to date of marriage in case of widows. By subsequent legislation the pension to widows was increased to $12 per month. Ten widows were still on the rolls on June 30, 1930. Total paid, $46,194,000.

The first act touching specially this war passed January 29, 1887, when Congress granted a pension of $8 per month to the surviving soldiers and sailors of this war provided they had served 60 days and were honorably discharged. By act of March 3, 1903, the compensation was increased to $12 per month. To be eligible survivors were required to be 62 years of age or over or else disabled from causes not connected with rebellion against the United States. Widows were entitled to pension on same terms. On June 30, 1930, there were still 630 widows of this war on the rolls and the total expenditures had been $59,470,000.

There are two distinct systems of pension connected with this war. Under the acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873, any soldier or sailor disabled by reason of wound or injury received or disease contracted in the service of the United States and in the line of duty may be pensioned for such disability during its continuance. In case of his death from causes originating as above set forth his widow or his child or children under 16 became entitled to pension.

The other class of pensions, not related to disability, first became a serious issue in 1886, when President Cleveland vetoed a bill to provide such. On June 27, 1890, however, such a bill became law and any soldier or sailor who had served 90 days or more during the Civil War and was honorably discharged became eligible for a pension of $6 to $12 per month if he was suffering from a permanent disability not the result of his own vicious habits such as to prevent him from earning his own support. Widows and children of such veterans were provided for under similar terms. On June 30, 1930, there were 48,991 veterans and 167,674 widows and minor children and to that date the total sum paid to pensioners of the Civil War was $7,370,462,000. The original 1890 bill was liberalized somewhat by an act of May 9, 1900, and May 11, 1912; 69,254 cases were dealt with also by special acts to June 30, 1927. The high point was 1913, 48 years after the close of the war, when the total sum paid was $174,171,000 for a single year. The highest number of pensioners was in 1905, 998,441.

The provisions of the Civil War pension acts of 1862 and 1873, etc., regarding total and complete disability contracted in the service and the supplementary provision regarding widows and orphans apply also to the widows and orphans resulting from this war.

In 1922 and by subsequent legislation the treatment of these veterans has been liberalized. As far as I am able to determine, there was no provision before 1930 which awarded compensation to Spanish War veterans for disabilities not contracted in the service, though the administration of the existing law was very liberal and in case of doubt as to whether a disability was contracted in or out of the service the petitioner was awarded relief. The absence of special legislation for the benefit of these veterans can be attributed to the fact that the Civil War pension system applied to these veterans from the first. The first provision for soldiers in this war compensating them for nonservice connected disabilities was on June 2, 1930. (This act included the veterans of the World War of 1917–18.)

Thank you. Now, gentlemen, if this were a question only of the bonus and the finances of the country permitted, I do not believe this committee would be holding extended hearings.

We were asked to adjust the compensation of all veterans of the World War, and many plans of bonuses and adjustments were submitted. Finally various organizations agreed upon a plan which resulted in the adjusted compensation act and the issuance of certificates payable in and around 1945.

The fact that we had 4,400,000 or more veterans in the service, of course, meant that every time any question of bonus or adjustment was raised we were faced with the question of finding the money. Any cash settlement involved a total staggering in its amount.

The reasons that the provisions of the adjusted compensation act were found satisfactory were first, they were capable of being financed on a sinking-fund basis by setting aside an amount every year to build up the fund necessary to pay the certificates at maturity.

The act also contemplated a larger amount payable to each individual veteran than would otherwise have been possible and gave them the benefit of 20 years' amortization.

It also took into consideration the fact that the certificate would become payable at the very age when a tidy little sum would be helpful to the average American family. Everyone seemed satisfied at the time. We passed that act over the veto of the President. Then we were confronted with the necessity of permitting loans up to 50 per cent to be made upon these certificates. We were told then, and the estimates were given to us of the number of men who might take advantage of that loan, how much would be borrowed. The number who took advantage of the loan provision far surpassed any estimate that was made.

The members of the committee and my colleagues who are here to-day will recall that the estimates made by the proponents of the cash bonus at the time of the consideration of the bill were that from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 would be required. The estimate made by General Hines of the Veterans' Administration was $1,000,000,000. I am sure my colleagues will all remember that that estimate was ridiculed as being excessively high and not justified. Now we know that since February 27, 1931, no less than 2,554,400 loans have been made and that $963,759,953 has been paid out on these loans. It is interesting to note that of the 3,662,374 certificates issued 2,554,400 have taken advantage of the loans.

We were told then that the additional amount of money placed in circulation would serve as a stimulant to business and that that in and of itself would be sufficient to pull us out of the depression we were then in. Some voted in accordance with that belief. Others of us voted from purely sentimental reasons.

Now we find that a large percentage of the veterans have taken advantage of that act and have borrowed 50 per cent of the face value of their certificates, and unless the law is changed, at the time of maturity there will be very little, if anything, coming to them.

As I read the history of the treatment of veterans by the United States Congress and as I know the feeling of the Members of the present Congress, I am just as certain as I am standing here this moment that eventually legislation will be passed refunding the interest charges, so that the veterans who were compelled to borrow will not be wiped out entirely.

Now we come to the proposition that is before you and that is urged for two reasons. The proponents have been very fair and frank in their attitude. They state that, primarily, the purpose of this legislation is to inflate currency, and the question of paying the bonus to the veterans at this time is purely incidenal, or secondary.

Now, gentlemen, if that is all, I submit it is hardly fair to use the veterans for this purpose. If the real purpose is to inflate the currency, then, of course, that contemplates an increase in commodity prices. It decreases the value of the dollar. If the purpose is to inflate the currency so as to decrease the value of the dollar and increase commodity prices—and that is conceded—then I say that we promised these boys good, wholesome American dollars and we ought to pay them in good, wholesome American dollars. It is not fair to take it out of the veterans. We will be confronted with that after the first impulse of the cash payment has passed away.

The second reason for selecting the veterans is the critical condition of unemployment and destitution existing among the veterans. That is a subject to which I have been giving a great deal of time and study. I believe that in my repeated statements on the floor of the House on that subject of unemployment, direct relief, and stabilization of industries, I have made myself perhaps something of a nuisance in the House. But, gentlemen, we are not only in the midst of an economic depression, but we are in the midst of an economic readjustment and a change in our whole economic system. Not all the platitudes nor all the presidential proclamations, nor all the corner turning is going to get us out of this depression. The whole financial structure is collapsing and the method suggested here is by no means a cure, a permanent cure.

It may cause a flurry for a short time, but it will redound to the disadvantage of these very veterans we are trying to help and the wage earners in general. Mr. Chairman, if only the veterans were unemployed, we could deal with this question very quickly. But I can not see how we are going to solve the problem of unemployment, if we take only the smallest percentage of any group of the army of the unemployed to-day. When I say the smallest percentage, I want to submit some figures to this committee. Let us take the youngster who was from 5 to 13 years of age in 1917 and 1918. He is to-day 20 to 28 years of age.

Those youngsters were not in the Army. They could not have been, by the nature of things. The census of unemployed as taken by the United States Bureau of the Census shows that in class A—that is, persons out of a job, able to work and looking for a job—in 1930 there were 2,420,062 total. I have criticized that figure. It was too low. But that is by reason of the classification of the Census Bureau and perhaps because of its limited means and time to get the figures. The census of unemployed does furnish us a basis for accurate computation for our purpose here.

But we can take that as a basis to figure our groups according to ages, and if the figure is 50 per cent too low, as it was at the time—I think it was about 55 or 60 per cent too low—our proportions still remain the same.

Of the 2,420,000 unemployed in 1930, according to the Bureau of the Census, 361,262 were women. In this computation we have disregarded entirely the children of 10 to 14 years in class A, because some of them were not even born when war was declared; in fact, none of them were born. We then eliminated the group from 15 to 19 years, for obvious reasons, because the oldest was 4 years of age when war was declared. We excluded the group from 20 to 24, and the group from 25 to 29 years for the reason that the oldest of these groups were not of military age in 1917.

Then we took a proper percentage of the group from 30 to 34 years, granting that every boy of 18 years of age at the time was in the Army, which, of course, is a most violent assumption. But conceding all that, we then got the percentage of the men over 35 years of age who were in the service. There were 113,190 over 35 years of age. I was one of them.

We took that percentage of the total number and applied it to the group 55 to 59 years of age and then excluded all the rest from 59 to 70 years of age, because owing to their age they could not have been in the service, because they were too old at the time. And I say, we allowed every young man over 18 years of age to be counted as having been in the service, and I repeat that is a most wild assumption. Taking all of those, there can be to-day only about 13 per cent of the unemployed who are veterans.

Now, can we single out 13 per cent in dealing constructively with the question of unemployment, regardless of our feeling for the veteran, regardless of our desire to help him? Can we take the boy who was 18 years of age in 1917 and hand him a lump sum because of the unemployment situation, and leave his neighbor or his brother who, through no fault of his own, was only a youngster 15 years of age at that time, but who is also unemployed now, without help?

Can we take the man who was 40 years of age, who was too old to enter the Army, who is now 55 years of age and, gentlemen, who is unemployed, and perhaps permanently unemployed, and do nothing for him?

Can we disregard the need, the necessity of doing something constructive to aid the superannuated worker, and go to the extent of putting our printing presses to work and issuing $2,000,000,000 of relief money to take care of 13 per cent of the unemployed, absolutely ignoring the superannuated worker and the other mass of workers who were too young to enter the service?

In other words, under the cash bonus bill, in dealing with the subject of necessary relief based on destitution brought about by unemployment, we would care for only 12 or 13 per cent of the total, ignoring 68 or 67 per cent, giving this 68 or 67 per cent no consideration at all, and in order to take care of the 13 per cent we would have to give a cash bonus to over 2,700,000 men who do not need a cash bonus. That surely is not only an unscientific but a manifestly unfair way to approach the subject of unemployment.

Will that solve our unemployment problem? If we are to do something, if we are to go to the extent of printing money or issuing bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000, let us do something so that the veteran will get the full benefit of it, but also the entire country will get some benefit of it; do something that will prevent a recurrence of the depression we are in now, a recurrence of a prolonged period of unemployment in the future.

If 13 per cent of the unemployed constitute the body of veterans, how many of the veterans are there who fortunately are employed and cared for and who would be in no need of a bonus? Have you considered that?

Why, gentlemen, we have in the Government service alone—the Federal Government—152,562 veterans. They are on the pay roll. Surely they should not be handed a bonus when an equal number of their fellow citizens have no employment, want to work, and are unable, through no fault of theirs, to find employment, but were either too young or too old to be veterans, are not provided for.

I have endeavored to obtain an estimate of the number of veterans in the State, county, and municipal services, but it is extremely difficult to get those figures, because some of our States have no statistics on the subject.

Have you been able to get any, Mr. BACHARACH?

Mr. BACHARACH. No; I was going to ask you that question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, New Mexico reports there are 1,000, approximately, in the State, municipal, and county services.

Massachusetts reports there are 37,726 in the permanent employ of the State and municipalities who are under civil service. They report that it is impossible to obtain the number who are not under civil service.

Pennsylvania has 1,075 World War veterans employed by the State (this does not include county and municipal service).

Texas reports that they estimate 3,000 out of approximately 150,000 ex-service men are in municipal or governmental service in the State of Texas, either State, county, or municipal.

Virginia reports that 15 per cent of the personnel in State, county, and municipal services are veterans of the World War.

Arizona—and Arizona seems to have the most complete and accurate figures—reports 302.

Perhaps by taking the States from which we have reports and the percentage of population together with their civil-service rolls that we might strike an average. I might say that my own State, New York, has no accurate figures on that subject. But I simply want to point out to you gentlemen that since the war every possible consideration has been given our veterans in civil-service preference both in the Federal Government and in State, county, and municipal governments.

Relief is being accorded all over the country to veterans. Time did not permit a canvass of all the States, but responses received from 12 cities, I believe, reflect the attitude all over the country toward veterans' relief.

"Newark, N. J., Jerome T. Congleton, mayor: Of 7,500 families receiving aid, 60 per cent are veterans. Money appropriated by the city. City has always cared for needy veterans, but numbers are much greater now, due to present conditions. Aid will be continued until the need does not exist.

"Boston, Mass., John J. Lydon, soldiers' relief commission: Approximately $200,000 expended on veterans since January 1, 1932. Anticipate spending $800,000 in 1932; 1,625 families and veterans aided in March, making a total of 5,644 individuals. One hundred and three Spanish War veterans aided in March, 209 individuals benefiting; 179 Civil War cases aided in March, 180 individuals benefiting. Money received by taxation. Forwarding annual report of department for 1930.

"Detroit, Mich., John F. Ballenger, general superintendent, department of public welfare: 1,750 families of veterans received aid in March from public welfare. Average cost per family per month, $33 permanent. City department financed through taxation. Community fund spent $873 for veterans' families in March. Funds derived from solicitation community fund considered permanent organization; spends average of $12,000 per year for veterans.

"Philadelphia, Pa., J. Hampton Moore: City makes no direct appropriation for veterans' relief. Veterans in distress may have received assistance from an independent committee to which city transferred $3,000,000 last year but that city fund expired December 31.

"New York, N. Y., Frank J. Taylor: 15,000 veterans and families receiving aid. New York City funds appropriated by city government. Been going on for many years according to State law. Four million dollars spent 1931; $6,000,000 estimated 1932. All expenses borne by taxpayers New York City.

"San Francisco, Calif., 600 to 1,000 World War veterans receiving relief from community chest, the San Francisco municipal employees' relief fund, and veterans' organizations. Figures approximate because no distinction made as to recipients of relief. Organized relief started in fall of 1930. Will cease in May to reopen in fall if conditions necessitate.

"Milwaukee, Wis., Daniel W. Hoan, mayor: Since 1929, Milwaukee County spent over $360,000, raised by direct property tax, to take care of veterans. In February the total number on relief lists was 2,283. This work handled by soldiers' relief commission created in 1888 and will continue indefinitely. Amount spent in 1931 was $65,000 greater than in 1930.

"Minneapolis, Minn., relative veterans receiving aid from city would estimate 300 single men and 1,000 families. Funds from taxation. Difficult to say just how long this has been going on and will continue. Above figures do not include private agencies.

"Cincinnati, Ohio, Fred K. Hoehler, commissioner of welfare: 700 families on soldiers' relief granted by Hamilton County; approximately 600 individuals aided by transient service bureau; 1,000 additional families ex-service men helped by family welfare agencies.

"Buffalo, N. Y., Charles E. Roesch, mayor: Veterans receiving aid from 1925 to 1931: World War veterans, 8,084; Grand Army of the Republic and Spanish War, 2,117. World War veterans' relief has had 4,787 applications for home relief since July 1. In March, 1932, there were 3,226 active cases. Funds provided by local taxation. In 1920 legislature authorized aid for World War veterans. Has heard of no suggestion that the State laws relative to veterans' relief be changed.

"Cleveland, Ohio, B. S. Pyke, welfare division, city of Cleveland: No veterans on city. City subsidizes private agencies; 2,000 families active cases on soldiers and sailors' relief, county supported; 3,000 families on waiting list; 125 on Red Cross. Figures obtained from soldiers and sailors' relief.

"Pittsburgh, Pa., local Red Cross reports 618 disabled veterans and 483 able veterans on their relief; Veterans of Foreign Wars have 75 men on relief; Legion gives no relief. Unable to get figures from their auxiliaries. Disabled Veterans report 25. City hospital has 70, both disabled and psychopathic; Allegheny County, similar institution, has 44; total of 1,315 that are known. Further investigation might disclose more."

Of course, if 13 per cent, which is a very fair and generous estimate of the present unemployed who are veterans—and it is easy to compute that a large percentage of the veterans certainly are not now unemployed—represent the proportion of veterans to the total of unemployed, in dealing with the question at this time as it is presented, one of relief and of necessary, immediate relief, I would take all of the unemployed and consider them as a group, and not pick first the small percentage of veterans who are unemployed and at the same time include the larger percentage of veterans who are employed and not in need of a cash bonus at this time; at a time when a large number—I estimate that number easily between six and seven million—of American workers are unemployed.

What is going to be the feeling of the veterans' neighbors in their home towns if Congress says, "We have solved the unemployment situation by paying a cash bonus to the veteran," and the veteran goes to his bank and cashes his check, and his fellow citizens who are unemployed can not even get a job? What will they think of Congress in solving this serious problem that is not only confronting our country but is confronting the whole world?

When I say the whole world is confronted with this problem, it is. First, there are the changed methods of production by machine, displacing men. That would have happened had we no World War and we in this country would have been the first to feel it. We would have unemployment, gentlemen, in this country even if we had no financial crisis or depression, by reason of our modern, progressive, efficient methods of production.

So that is a question which we will have to solve by legislation affecting the hours of labor, the number of days of labor in the week, and caring for superannuated workers. That must keep pace with the machine age.

The same problem arose in other countries after the World War. England was facing an unemployment situation before the World War, and I do not believe that we can afford to sit idly by and take a laissez faire attitude and say that this question is going to adjust itself. It is not.

I want to make a prediction right now, gentlemen, that before long some of the people who are now opposing the cash bonus are going to come out for it, for selfish, sordid, unpatriotic reasons.

The poor veteran has been used and misused. When I was at the city hall in New York in 1920, my colleagues on the committee from New York will remember that we had pending a readjustment in wages and salaries; there were labor troubles, and one time we were threatened with a longshoremen's strike.

Selfish people, seeking to take advantage of the situation, endeavored to set up the patriotic organizations of veterans to break the strike of the longshoremen. I called them into my office at the city hall, the representatives of the veterans' organizations, representatives of the workers who themselves were veterans, but we adjusted their dispute in 15 minutes. The boys saw the light. They saw that they were being misused for many occasions; the veterans are sought for exploitation. The friends, the real friends of the veteran, will keep them but will not permit them to be used for selfish interests, for political advantage, or be exploited in any way.

We are confronted with an economic readjustment in this country and we have to face the situation. We have to take into consideration the machine age in which we are; we have to provide shorter hours, and a shorter work week, and unemployment insurance, and old-age pensions in order to bring up the level, and then you are going to see, gentlemen, a dash made by selfish people to use these same veterans to offset social legislation of that kind. The veterans I know will not lend themselves to any such purpose.

I do not want to see my comrades improperly used for any such purpose. I am sure that if we could explain the mathematics of our economics to the veterans, they would be the first to say, "Don't turn over $2,000,000,000 to us at this time. We will get that eventually. But do something for all Americans who are unemployed."

Now, this committee has jurisdiction. You are now considering H. R. 1. I ask this committee to give consideration to H. R. 2. I introduced that bill the first day of the session, after many, many months of study and consideration. I will concede it is crude, it is imperfect. At least it will give us a starting point, give us the basis of applying some thought to this economic readjustment.

My bill provides for a national system of unemployment insurance. Call it a dole, gentlemen, you are not going to scare me. No one is going to be scared by a name. We have had some experience with dole-giving in this session of Congress. Call it a dole. It is going to retard its acceptance, perhaps, somewhat, but if I understand conditions, American people will simply refuse to go hungry while they are in the richest country in the world. We will have to provide some system of insurance to take care of such depressions, periods of unemployment. It will shorten these so-called economic cycles, because it does not entirely destroy the purchasing power which falls immediately upon any period of unemployment.

If we are to use money for the purposes of inflation, if we are to start the Bureau of Engraving working nights and overtime for that purpose, may I submit that we could start by furnishing the initial fund necessary to put a national system of unemployment insurance into effect? That will immediately create purchasing power, a demand for the necessaries of life, and that will have a permanent effect on our economic system.

It will be said, "Well, England has a system of unemployment insurance. It has ruined England." It has done no such thing. It has saved England. There would be no England to-day had they not had the foresight away back in 1910 to pass the first unemployment insurance law, which was perfected in 1912. Then the war came along.

But the mistake in the English system was this, that they excluded all industries where employment was permanent, such as state railways, civil service; all industries where employment was permanent were excluded from the original unemployment insurance act of England.

Profiting by that experience, of course, we would not repeat what they did, because we have learned in this depression that even those industries where employment is permanent are affected. We have seen that in our railroads and we are seeing it right now in our Government service. So that any national system of unemployment insurance which we would adopt would necessarily benefit by the experience of England and Germany and some of the smaller countries that have adopted a system of unemployment insurance.

Gentlemen, we can not avoid it. As optimistic as we may be, we are not going to get out of the situation and get to the point where we will have no unemployed, for a long time. We must take care of the superannuated employees who can not keep pace with the machine age.

Leave it to the States, you say? We can not leave it to the States. We are one economic unity, regardless of how we may feel about State rights and our State pride. We find that unemployment in Alabama affects New York; unemployment in New York affects Nebraska and North Dakota. We have experienced that in our factory laws and in our child labor laws. Some of the States have enacted proper, protective laws preventing the employment of children of tender years in factories. What was the result? We open our daily papers and we find full-page advertisements of chambers of commerce of other States who say, "Come down to our State and establish your factory there, where labor of all ages is plentiful and where we have no restrictive laws."

And they do. We found that out in our income-tax and inheritance-tax system. States will go along, while other States will refuse and advertise the fact, and then there is migration to those States. That was the case in the inheritance-tax provisions until we hit upon the policy of the 80–20 system of inheritance taxation, and several States changed their constitutions to take advantage of it.

So we will have to adjust ourselves in this matter of unemployment to make it uniform, so that the progressive, advanced State will not be put to a disadvantage in good times by a State which refuses to keep abreast, and in times of unemployment the State with the insurance system would inherit all of the unemployed from the other States. I say we must make this a national system.

Now, I understand, gentlemen, the tremendous pressure that is being brought to bear upon you. I know that some of my colleagues and friends will say, "Why, LAGUARDIA, you know you have not got a chance to have H. R. 2 considered at this time." But we are accustomed to that. We know that we are leading the way for welfare and social legislation. We know that it is coming.

Gentlemen, 10 years ago I sat and talked with Governor SHALLENBERGER, of Nebraska. We talked of a system of guaranteed bank deposits. I talked about that for the last 10 years, and I was laughed at. I was howled down many times on the floor of the House. But within not very many weeks from now we are going to pass a law guaranteeing deposits in banks. Senator Owen, who sits here, was likewise one of the pioneers in that movement. We did not lose courage, but it took us all of this time to get the action we wanted. We worked for 15 years before we could convince Congress of the necessity of remedying the condition of the abuse of Federal courts in labor disputes, and a few weeks ago, thanks to the kindly interest of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the Speaker, we passed that bill.

So, I am not discouraged at all. I know that I am going to be misunderstood by many of my comrades in my attitude to-day, but I follow that school of politics that believes in thinking out loud, that believes in taking a position. And I want to say this, without criticism of the slightest of my colleagues, that if a secret vote were taken on this bill in the House of Representatives, it would not get 30 votes. I say that after cloak-room conversation with my colleagues. That being so, it seems to me I am justified in coming here before this committee and making this statement.

Now, are we to admit that representative government is a failure because of organized demands for legislation? We have organized demands. Sometimes we succumb and sometimes Congress does not. No one knows it better than the distinguished acting chairman of this committee, because I know he went through hell during the last few weeks in the consideration of the tax bill. I know the tremendous pressure that was brought to bear on this committee and the most dismal, dark pictures of the future were depicted in order to convince this committee that they ought to adopt a taxing policy which was contrary—at least I believe so—to the best interests of this country.

There you had organized propaganda. Here you have organization. Oh, I know I am going to meet it; it is not the first time I have had to meet it.

There are three forms of government that are being tested in the world to-day. We have the soviet system of Russia. We have the fascist system, the dictatorship of Italy, and we have the representative form of government, government of the people, still in the United States, England, and France.

Are we going to say that although we know it is wrong, because of organized groups of splendid, active young men who misunderstand the situation, we are going to succumb and vote contrary to the best interests of the country? Are we going to admit that Mussolini is right, that republics and parliamentary forms of government are failures for that reason? I do not believe it. I still have hope in representative government. I still think it is possible, if a measure is wrong, that we can stand up and oppose it.

Are we going to sit idly by and let the wealth of this country tell us that "we will not put our money to work, we will buy Government bonds and you will have to support us, if you do not pass the kinds of laws we want industry will stop"? Are we going to admit that Lenin was right? I refuse to do so. But we have to meet the attacks from both of these sources.

We have to consider the welfare of 126,000,000 people and worse things can happen to a Member of Congress than being defeated, if he knows, if he feels he is right.

I appear this morning not on behalf of organized veterans. That is the easy thing to do. I appear this morning on behalf of the 6,000,000 unorganized, unemployed, among them veterans who have no means of contacting Congress, who are willing to work, who are unable to understand why they are not able to find work. On their behalf I appeal that if Congress is going to do something to relieve distress, do not single out a small, powerful group, but consider this great army that has contributed to the make-up, the wealth, the power of this country. Let us take the whole situation, let us take the whole economic problem and consider it and deal with it constructively; and if we want to inflate our money, we can inflate money in such a way as to give all the people of this country the full benefit of any such measure.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions of Mr. LAGUARDIA?

Mr. RAGON. I want to ask the major a few questions that I wanted to ask Mr. PATMAN. I have noted a number of questions. The major dwelt on this subject at the beginning of his remarks. I saw a statement of the benefits given to the veteran up to date, I believe, in the New York Times of Monday a week ago. I was wondering if you had checked up on those figures. For instance, I find an item of $644,000,000 for vocational training.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. That was in the first few years right after the war.

Mr. RAGON. Have you the amount that the Government paid on insurance for the veterans?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You will find that in the insurance adjusted——

Mr. RAGON. I mean the war-risk insurance. I have a figure here of $1,003,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is about right.

Mr. RAGON. And then for Veterans' Administration there has been spent $2,100,000,000. Have you any figure on that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is right.

Mr. RAGON. And then for allotments and allowances, $582,931,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; $582,931,845.08.

Mr. RAGON. And administrative overhead and miscellaneous expenditures, $656,000,000. That gives a total, in other words, of $5,435,000,000 that has been spent on the veterans since 1918 or during the war period and up to the present time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That does not correspond altogether with my figures. My figure from the Veterans' Bureau is to date a total amount of $6,124,068,083.80 has been spent.

Mr. RAGON. Your figure is $6,000,000,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes, sir. That includes military and naval compensation; emergency officers' retirement pay; disability allowance; military and naval insurance, United States Government life insurance; adjusted-service certificate fund; adjusted service and dependent pay; administration and hospitalization; hospital and domiciliary facilities and services, Veterans' Administration construction—that includes construction. There is the difference between our figures. Vocational rehabilitation, allotments and allowances, marine and seamen's insurance, and miscellaneous.

I believe the difference between us is the figure of construction. That figure in this table is $60,607,133.

Mr. RAGON. I do not have that item. Have you any tabulation as to what that amounts to per soldier?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but it would be a few minutes to get it.

Mr. VINSON. Does that sum include the money paid into the sinking fund to take care of the bonus?

Mr. RAGON. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The disbursements on the adjusted-service certificates—the adjusted-service certificate fund was $124,917,000 and adjusted-service dependent pay $42,000,000.

Mr. RAGON. It would be something in the neighborhood of $1,200 or $1,500 per man at a total expenditure of about $5,000,000,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that Major LAGUARDIA put that table to which he has been referring in the record?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. It will be made a part of the record.

(The table referred to is as follows:)

Mr. DICKINSON. Congressman LAGUARDIA made the statement which attracted my attention, that some time in the future Congress, in his judgment, would pass a provision returning to the ex-service men who held these certificates the interest charge. I want to ask him if he saw in the press about the time the 50 per cent was authorized a statement as coming from the Treasury Department that if all veterans applied for loans, the Treasury would make about $70,000,000 annually, based upon the idea that the Government was borrowing money at a low interest rate and was charging interest at 4½ per cent.

I want to ask Major LAGUARDIA in this connection, is it his idea that Congress in the future will pass a law returning the interest charged to the veterans, because the interest charge was excessive; and may I suggest to him—he probably has it in his mind—that it is the interest charge that will eat up the difference between the 50 per cent of the loan and the balance of the face value at the time of maturity.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. Of course the excess of interest is indefensible, and I suppose the rate was fixed at the time to care for any future period when the cost of money would be greater. But, regardless of that, I think in the light of our past experience and in our desire to be helpful to the veterans, I think that no Congress would ever permit interest charges to eat up the balance of the certificate; and I would vote accordingly.

Mr. BACHARACH. There are two or three questions I want to ask you, Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the first place, in answer to my colleague, Mr. DICKINSON, you were going a long way when you inferred that there might be no interest charge for the balance that the soldiers owed. Personally, I do not approve of the rate of interest that is being charged; in the first place, we are charging 4½ per cent compound interest, but if a man happened to be foolish or ignorant enough to go to the bank and borrow the money, he is charged 6 per cent, and when the Government takes up that certificate it still charges the veteran 6 per cent. Manifestly there is an injustice there, and I think I approve very heartily of what you say, except I do not believe it would be fair to the men who have not borrowed to eliminate the interest entirely. I think there should be a fair rate of interest, say, the rate that the Government has to pay.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. BACHARACH, I do not want to shock you, but I will say this——

Mr. BACHARACH. I have been shocked before; it is all right.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say this. I firmly believe that by the time these certificates will mature, there will be such a change in our financial structure that no money unaccompanied by effort or labor will be worth more than 1 or 2 per cent a year.

Mr. BACHARACH. That may be all very true, but that is your judgment and of course I do not have to agree with it. Now, Mr. LAGUARDIA, I do want to ask a question merely for the sake of the record. I happen to know something about your own war record. Will you give it to us for the purposes of our record here?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My reply to that is this. I can only repeat the words of Orville Wright who, when he was discouraged, went to France to try out his plane. He had his opportunity and for the first time the people witnessed a sustained flight of a heavier-than-air machine. The Academy of Sciences gave him a banquet and they praised his great abilities. He was asked to make a speech and he said, "Gentlemen, the only bird that talks is a parrot and it does not fly."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. LAGUARDIA, it is proposed to expand the currency in order to meet this charge. I would like to hear you on that point. What do you think of that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, the spending of money is one of the easiest things Congress can do. But if that is the only justification for it, why not take this kind of money and use it to meet the deficits that are staring us in the face, instead of disorganizing the United States Government with arbitrary reductions of all kinds. If we are to distribute money, circulate money, why can we not use that to pay the interest on our outstanding bonds, which will take up a billion dollars in a year? Why can we not use this kind of money for public improvements?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not all interest.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Interest and sinking-fund requirements. It is over $800,000,000, $900,000,000, and the sinking-fund requirements bring it to over a billion dollars. Why not take this kind of money and go out and buy all our surplus crops, which will bring up commodity prices, sell the crops abroad for any price we can get for them; it will be that much to the good and that will reflect directly to the benefit of the veterans?

Mr. RAINEY. May I, apropos of your argument, as you reached the end of it, call your attention to what happened in Germany yesterday? It was not carried in display headlines, but in Germany they only had $225,000,000 worth of gold, nothing upon which they could base a further expansion of their currency. So they took the first steps toward inaugurating a system of international barter which would not require any money at all. They have had such a recent bad experience with expanding their currency that they do not want to go into that any more unless they have at the base of it a sufficient amount of gold to do it. So they have now inaugurated a system of international barter for their purposes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, there was a time, Mr. RAINEY, when economists could get up and talk to people about gold and gold reserves and they thought it was something mysterious that could not be fathomed and they accepted what they said about it. But now the average workingman thinks in terms of food and clothes and shoes and rent and education, and after all, that is the real test of the value of your services or for the return of what you produce. Our whole economic system is artificial and it has been kept alive all these years because of the ignorance of the masses. But we are slowly evolving from that stage and coming to an enlightened period when the farmer who raises so many acres of wheat figures that wheat in terms of machinery and education for his children and the opportunity to live decently. So I think we will have very soon a change in our whole monetary system.

Mr. HILL. Mr. LAGUARDIA, what is your information as to the number of unemployed veterans?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I figure that, assuming that every boy of military age from 18 to 30 were in the military service in 1917 and 1918, it would be about 22 per cent of the present unemployed.

Mr. HILL. About 22 per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. About 22 of the unemployed.

Mr. HILL. Of the total of unemployment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Twenty-two per cent would be veterans; yes. Then we have to allow something for the veterans who are employed, and I think a very generous allowance would show that the percentage of unemployed veterans to the total of unemployed would be less than 13 per cent.

Mr. HILL. That is, 13 per cent of the total unemployment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Not just of the veterans themselves?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; 13 per cent of the unemployed army. I think that is a fair estimate.

Mr. CANFIELD. What percentage of the World War veterans are unemployed?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There are various estimates that have been given here on that. Perhaps Mr. RANKIN can answer that.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know just what the percentage is. I do not think that is very material. This is a bill for the benefit of all the American people.

Mr. CANFIELD. Just one other question. The tables that you submitted for the record, did you compile it yourself or did you get it from the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I got that from the Veterans' Bureau. Gentlemen, may I cite for the record a most interesting compilation of our pension laws, Federal Military Pensions of the United States, by Glasson? I want to give you that because I know you will find it very useful, very enlightening.

Mr. CROWTHER. Congressman, you have referred almost wholly to the Patman bill for the issuance of $2,400,000,000 worth of Treasury notes. In your opinion, is there any more merit attached to the so-called Thomas bill, which provides for 2 per cent consols, 30 years, distributed among the Federal reserve banks according to their proportionate residence of soldiers, or other things, and the issuance of currency on them, or have you looked into the proposition by Senator Owen——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us take one at a time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Take the Thomas proposal. That practically is the same as the Patman proposal, except it would cost us 2 per cent a year.

Mr. CROWTHER. Well of course, Senator THOMAS did not agree to that. He argued, among other things, he was rather opposed to the Patman method in that it might result in disturbing the present Federal reserve currency by this new issue.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we issue bonds to the Federal reserve and they, in turn, issue currency, it is tantamount to the same system, except you have one hurdle in between and an additional cost to the taxpayers of 2 per cent a year.

Mr. CROWTHER. Have you given any consideration to the plan presented by Senator Owen?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What plan is that?

Mr. CROWTHER. Senator Owen has a plan for the issuance of 4 per cent bonds to be distributed to the Federal reserve banks and by them to their agents, and then I think he has linked up with it—and he is here and I know he will correct me if I am wrong—he has linked up with that a suggestion that we use the Goldsborough and similar bills for the stabilization of the representative commodity prices, 100 of them, on the basis of the involved year, 1926. Then, of course, they all make the statement that necessarily following one of these bond issues of money, commodity prices will immediately rise; but none of them suggests to us it will take more of that kind of dollars to buy commodities. Now they suggest, or I think Senator Owen suggests, when those commodity prices show any evidence of rising, then they shall sell some of these bonds and cancel the currency which resulted from them, and maintain a balance. He claims we may maintain an economic balance by that method.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, in any system of inflation we must bring wages up to meet the increased commodity prices. If you do not do that, then the working people of this country are going to pay all of the costs. So that when we do have inflation, we can not just say we will dump in $2,000,000,000; we have to inflate gradually and bring up the standard of wages to it; otherwise, the working people are going to pay for it. And I am not going to stand for that, if I can help it.

Mr. WATSON. Do you consider, if we pass the $2,000,000,000 bonus, that will be only temporary relief; or do you think it will be permanent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It won't solve any particular problem permanently.

Mr. WATSON. No more than the $1,000,000,000 that was given one year ago?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A little more, Mr. WATSON. There will be a flurry, but it will last a little longer. Commodity prices will go up; but, at the end of that, we will have just as many unemployed.

Mr. WATSON. Then after two years, how are we going to take care of the veterans?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is why I am pleading to-day to make a comprehensive study of our whole unemployment situation and our depressed industrial system. I am not concerned, Mr. WATSON, about the stock ticker; it is no indication at all either of our financial or our industrial, or social well-being; but I urge a comprehensive study of our industrial depression, our unemployment, so that we can solve this question. And if we are to spend $2,000,000,000, let us do it at least where we can have a hope of some permanent cure.

Mr. WATSON. We must take care of the soldiers after the two billions are expended. We have already given $8,500,000,000 in pensions since 1790.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; war is awfully costly.

Mr. WATSON. Therefore I can not see any other way of taking care of the soldiers two years from now, after all this money is expended, than to have a system of pensions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we follow the same ratio and the same attitude of other wars and we continue to provide for disabilities not service connected, in 1952 the requirements will be, yearly requirements will be, about $2,000,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. For veterans?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For the care of veterans.

Mr. HAWLEY. In your compilation of the number of unemployed do you segregate them so that you could tell how many are men and how many are women?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; we made that allowance.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do you know of the number of unemployed you stated how many are men and how many are women?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; it is in the record now.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman recall about the proportion?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of the 2,420,062 unemployed covered by the Census Bureau, 361,262, or, roughly, 15 per cent, were women.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. LAGUARDIA, in the earlier part of your testimony I understood you to say you regarded the payment to the veterans secondary to the desire on some people's part of inflation of the currency?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I stated that the sponsors of H. R. 1 so stated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; that the real object, the primary object——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The primary object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Was the inflation of the currency. Is that correct?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is what I understood from reading the reports of these hearings.

Mr. TREADWAY. Was that same argument used when Congress, in the last session, paid 50 per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but it was more crudely and not as scientifically used.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then that was secondary?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, it was stated, and a great many of our colleagues believed, that the placing in circulation of this added amount would help; would give a stimulus to trade and business, local and otherwise.

Mr. CROWTHER. With reference to this very last statement that you made, it was suggested to us that it would pull us out of this hole we were in and help us to return to somewhat normal conditions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The record will bear that out, I think.

Mr. CROWTHER. But the proponents of this new measure, this year, suggest the reason it did not do it and did not do it more materially than it did, was the fact we simply took money from one class and distributed it to another; but that this measure would do it, because we are putting new lifeblood into the currency—putting new money in circulation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the proponents are absolutely sincere in their convictions, although I do not agree with them.

Mr. CRISP. We thank you, Major. Now we will hear Congressman ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. We are not asking for the setting aside of the rules, but we are proceeding under the liberalized rules of this House. If the adjusted-service certificates are paid now, as provided in this bill, which is H. R. 1 amended—

(a) Three million six hundred and sixty thousand veterans of the World War will receive $2,200,000,000. The money will be quickly paid without graft, additional taxes, or favoritism, and the people in every city, county, and State will get their share, which will make tax payments easier. This money will go to ten times more people than if expended for either public buildings or highway construction. Purchasing power will be placed into the hands of consumers, thus promoting production and employment.

(b) The debt will be paid without a bond issue, without increasing taxes, without unbalancing the Budget, and in no way will affect the gold standard.

(c) The increased money placed into circulation will be in competition with hoarded dollars and will thereby force money out of hoarding.

(d) The money will go to patriotic American citizens and will be spent in America.

(e) It will not cause people to go into debt more, as most relief measures propose, but it will liquidate debts equal to ten times the amount of currency issued.

(f) It is an absolutely needed expansion of the currency. It is an honest-dollar bill. [Applause.]

(g) A constitutional mandate requiring Congress to regulate the value of money will be complied with.

(h) Some international bankers will be displeased, but millions of American citizens will be made happy and American prosperity vigorously promoted.

If the adjusted-service certificates are not paid now 1,000,000 veterans out of jobs and 1,000,000 more who are working from one to three days a week at greatly reduced wages will be forced to deprive themselves and families of the necessities of life while the banks and the Government consume the remainder of their certificates by interest payments on prior loans.

If this bill is considered we will follow the minority report filed by 10 members of the Ways and Means Committee and insert the Owen plan for payment, and be able to prove:

(a) That each holder of an adjusted-service certificate is now entitled to an amount of money equal to the face or maturity value of his certificate, by invoking the same principles and policies of government that have been invoked for others, including the war profiteers.

(b) That such payment will not only not be detrimental to the country, but as Senator Owen suggested before the Ways and Means Committee, "It will be a godsend to this Nation."

(c) That the plan for distributing the money is the same in principle as the plan now allowed by national banks and as advocated by the unanimous report of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in its report on the Goldsborough bill.

(d) That we are merely asking that a noncirculating Government obligation be converted into a circulating Government obligation.

We demand justice for the veterans, but we also demand a fair price for corn, cotton, wheat, hogs, cattle, land, agricultural products, and for fair wages for the labor in our great factories. This bill will accomplish that result. If it passes, this panic will disappear and prosperity will return. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired, and the question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 226, nays 175, answered "present" 1, not voting 29, as follows:

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HASTINGS, is unavoidably absent. He has a pair with the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. JOHNSON. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and Mr. JOHNSON would vote "nay."

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BECK, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ERK. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I therefore withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. TILSON, is attending the national convention at Chicago. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 220

Resolved, That upon the day succeeding the adoption of this resolution a special order be, and is hereby, created by the House of Representatives for the consideration of H. R. 7726, notwithstanding the adverse report on said bill. That on said day the Speaker shall recognize the Representative from the first district of Texas, WRIGHT PATMAN, to call up H. R. 7726, a bill to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, as a special order of business, and to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the said H. R. 7726. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Member of the House requesting a rule for the considering of the said H. R. 7726 and a Member of the House who is opposed to the said H. R. 7726, to be designated by the Speaker, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit. The special order shall be a continuing order until the bill is finally disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 225, nays 170, answered "present" 3, not voting 33, as follows:

On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the bill (H. R. 7726) will be in order for consideration to-morrow, and the present occupant of the chair designates the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to control the time against the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand the construction of the rule, this bill will be in order as a privileged matter to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

TIME OF MEETING TO-MORROW

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11361) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the amendments and ask a conference with the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object; but I have reserved the right to do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the Members of the House who have not followed the matter closely, to the status of the bills which were passed early in this session, before the holidays, relating to the District of Columbia, and also to refresh the recollection of the Members somewhat on the report of the special committee appointed to investigate and make report on the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

I may say that the bills which passed the House practically unanimously, at least without any roll-call vote, and without any material opposition, have not been returned to this body, but have been pending before the body at the other end of the Capitol. The bills were referred to the Bureau of Efficiency, and my understanding from the accounts in the newspapers is that that bureau has approved in principle all four of the bills which were passed for the purpose of raising revenue. Just why it was necessary to refer the bills to that bureau I have not been able to understand, but that is the situation. The Bureau of Efficiency has not reported upon the bill to repeal the 60-40 provision of the law, but, as a matter of practice, that law has been practically repealed now for several years.

It will be recalled by the membership of the House, and I am sure by those members of the Committee on Appropriations who will be the conferees on this appropriation bill, that the special committee estimated that the bills which were passed by the House and which have now been approved in principle by the Bureau of Efficiency, if enacted into law, would raise something more than $4,000,000 per year, and that with their passage and the raising of that extra revenue it would not be necessary in normal times to increase the general property tax rate in the District of Columbia at all.

It was also stated in the report that with the present tax rate there would be a substantial surplus this year, after raising the amount recommended by the Budget, if those bills were passed and the $4,000,000 were raised, in addition to the Federal contribution recommended by the special committee, which was $6,500,000. My understanding is that the appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, reduced this Budget estimate by over $3,000,000, so that practically, without the passage of these bills raising this additional $4,000,000 revenue, and with very little, if any, increase in the tax rate, with the reduction which the Committee on Appropriations has made under the Budget recommendation, it would not be necessary to raise the Federal contribution over and above that carried in the bill as it passed the House, namely, $6,500,000.

Permit me to say further, as my attention has been called to the matter by the gentleman from Illinois, this city has not yet done what other cities have done. It has not yet reduced the salaries of District employees generally, as other cities have done. Some of them have reduced the salaries of their employees very materially, and it seems to me that this bill, as far as the Federal contribution is concerned, was about right as it passed the House of Representatives and went to the Senate, with the amount fixed at $6,500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman happens to know that if the bills he mentioned were passed it would cause the people who are holding them up and keeping them from passing to be taxed a little more heavily than they are now, and it would keep the people of the United States, generally, from paying a great part of the expense in the District of Columbia, which causes tax dodgers to escape taxation. That is possibly the reason why the bills have not been passed.

Mr. MAPES. That may be.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the bill as it passed the Senate have the $800,000 relief feature restored to it?

Mr. MAPES. My understanding is that it has. I was addressing myself, however, to the Federal contribution more particularly. I do not care to say anything more. I have every confidence in the conferees who will be appointed by the House to take care of the situation.

Mr. PARSONS. Do not the other cities take care of their own relief without having appropriations out of the Federal Treasury for that purpose? There is no reason why Washington should not conform to the same principle.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object if the gentleman from Michigan is going to surrender it.

Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] if the amount for relief in the District of Columbia which was stricken out by the committee has been reinstated by the Senate; and if so, how much?

Mr. CANNON. My understanding is that the amount of $600,000, which was originally requested, has been inserted by the Senate as a Senate amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, replying to the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS], I will say that it is true other cities have provided relief out of their municipal funds, but in this respect we are sitting here in the capacity of a board of aldermen for the city of Washington, and this is the only way the funds can be provided.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know whether the gentleman knows the fact or not, but this last January the regularly organized boards of charity in the District of Columbia got the powers that be to levy an assessment. They called it a voluntary contribution, but it was a real assessment against every Government worker of the United States in Washington.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is quite true.

Mr. BLANTON. The Government employees contributed one day's wage out of January, one day's wage out of February, and one day's wage out of March, and they raised a fund for the board of charities amounting to $2,400,000, most of which is now in the bank. That was for the regular work of the board of charities.

Our District auditor here did not get to disburse any of that money. He wanted some money to disburse. He wanted an overhead to put in offices, and he asked us to raise another $600,000 by appropriation for him to disburse.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the subcommittee, looked into the matter carefully. We held hearings. We called on Auditor Donovan for a breakdown. We asked what salaries he was going to pay, but we got none of the information we asked for. They said, in effect, it was none of our business.

I want to say to my friend that if he were on the committee of investigation he would not give them one red cent for Donovan to disburse, not one.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, let me reply to the gentleman from Texas.

The money collected was for the usual community chest, which is participated in by hospitals, educational institutions, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and many other institutions. None of these institutions, although they are serving a useful public purpose, are engaged in providing relief to take care of cases in the present emergency.

Unless I can get some assurance from the gentleman from Missouri that he will not come back into the House with a report that will either have to be voted up or voted down I shall be constrained to object for the present, or until we can talk the thing over.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Irrespective of the relief that has been furnished the tax rate in the District of Columbia is only $1.70 per hundred. In other cities of the United States it is two, three, and even four or five times as much.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All the more reason why we should not appropriate this money so much needed for relief. Let them put the tax rate up.

Mr. PARSONS. They ought to have the tax rate made high enough to take care of the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. The Board of Charities are helping in every way possible right now.

Mr. CANNON. Replying to the gentleman from New York, we are very anxious that this matter have every consideration. We shall be glad to have him appear before the conferees when it is taken up.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman mean to say that I may appear before the august conferees? I have been here 14 years, but I have never had a similar invitation extended to me.

Mr. CANNON. The conferees on the part of the House shall be glad to hear the gentleman either personally or collectively. And let me say in reply to the gentleman's suggestion that we are acting here as a civic counsel disbursing community funds that out of every dollar of the $600,000 which it is proposed to appropriate for this purpose 23 cents is a Federal appropriation. More than one-fifth of it is a direct contribution from the Federal Government.

Let me say further, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], that we fully appreciate the situation which he presented, and having that in mind exercised the most rigid economy in order to prevent the necessity for raising the rate of taxation in the District, and especially the rate of taxation on the real estate of the District.

We would have been glad to have been more liberal with some of the items in this bill, but we had to cut the coat from the cloth that was given us. We were under emphatic instructions from the House not to increase the amount of Federal contribution over $6,500,000, and in view of the fact that we have had no assurance that the Mapes bills will be passed and that additional revenue will be available from that source, it was necessary for us to eliminate many appropriations we would have been glad to include.

Mr. MAPES. May I say to the gentleman that I think the committee did a very commendable piece of work?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Senate bill provides an appropriation of $600,000 for direct relief. The gentleman can not ignore existing conditions. People will flock to the Capital. It is a natural impulse to look for aid to the Government, whether municipal, State, or Federal, for relief. We have a condition here which we can not ignore, and to say that we have here a community chest which gives to established institutions doing social work rather than relief work is no answer to the problem. I will not object if I can get the assurance of the gentleman from Missouri that he will keep an open mind on this subject and permit us to furnish information that will satisfy the gentleman from Texas and others. Otherwise, I am not willing to permit this bill to go to conference at this time. I have had some experience with conferees and conference reports in the 14 years I have served in the House. I resent the bringing in of conference reports and being told that we must take the report or leave it, and the conference submitted for adoption by a viva voce vote without any discussion. I take this particular provision most seriously, and I think the gentleman should assure us that he will give us an opportunity to get the facts before the conferees, and that he should go into the conference with an open mind.

Mr. CANNON. I appreciate the force of what the gentleman says. He may be certain we shall agree with him as far as our limited resources permit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed the following conferees: Messrs. CANNON, GRANFIELD, BLANTON, HOLADAY, and SIMMONS.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Ways and Means and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia presents a privileged resolution from the Committee on Ways and Means and asks for its immediate consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 429

Resolved, etc., That section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by striking out the words "or with any person other than a dealer," and by adding at the end thereof a new sentence, as follows: "If any article has, under a contract of the character above described, been delivered prior to June 21, 1932, to any person (other than a dealer or other than a person intending to use the article as material in the manufacture or production of another article, or to sell it on or in connection with, or with the sale of, another article), no tax shall be collected under this title."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is a revenue resolution and therefore is privileged. It simply seeks to correct an error made in the tax bill. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I regret the necessity of having to offer this resolution to correct a mistake in the tax bill. I am not offering any alibi for myself or the other conferees. The conferees when they met realized the importance to the country of reaching a speedy agreement. We worked from morning until late at night and did accomplish that. In that haste we overlooked this matter. It was called to my attention by the Treasury Department a few days after the bill was passed and by some of the business men whose interests were affected by it. In conference neither the Senate conferees, the House conferees, the Senate, the House, nor the drafting boards of the Treasury detected it.

Here is all the resolution does:

In all the tax bills there has been a provision that where a contract is made for future delivery and the contract does not specify who is to pay the taxes, if taxes are levied, the vendee has to pay them. If the contract specified that the vendor was to pay them, the vendor would pay them.

When this bill was up on the floor of the Senate the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] offered an amendment in which he sought to care for automobiles bought on the installment plan. When automobiles are bought on the installment plan, of course, the title does not pass until they are paid for. So Senator TRAMMELL offered this amendment intended to provide that taxes on automobiles, radios, electric refrigerators, and other things sold on the installment plan were not to be paid where the contract was made before May 1, and the vendee, not being a dealer, would have no opportunity to add the tax to his sales price.

The unexpected effect of this amendment being adopted is that the large companies—the steel companies, the American Bell Telephone Co, the Ford Co., the large taxicab companies, and the big industries that make contracts for two or three or four years in advance—would be relieved from paying the taxes that the bill specified should be paid on tires, tubes, gasoline, oil, or any other of the commodities that they bought that are taxable under the bill, a result not intended by Senator TRAMMELL nor the Senate or House conferees. The effect of the bill as it stands now is to require the small dealers, who have to pay more for their purchases than these big dealers, who buy in large quantities, to be put at a disadvantage. The big concerns, with contracts running three or four years, would not have to pay the excise taxes levied in the bill, while the small dealer would have to pay them. It is inequitable, it is unjust to the small dealers, and the Treasury will lose from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 that was contemplated the Treasury would receive under the tax bill as it passed.

This matter has been called to the attention of the Senate, and I am just advised that the Senator from Wisconsin, Senator LA FOLLETTE, obtained a unanimous-consent agreement in the Senate to-day that if the resolution correcting this error came over there, no amendment could be offered to it affecting any other provision of the bill, and the only amendments that could be offered would be germane amendments dealing with this subject matter.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has stated that when the conference report was under consideration it was estimated the bill would raise for 1933, according to my recollection, one billion one hundred and some odd million dollars.

Mr. CRISP. One billion one hundred and eighteen million dollars.

Mr. McCORMACK. Would this thirty millions to fifty millions of dollars be in addition to that amount?

Mr. CRISP. No; it is included in that amount.

This explains the purpose of the resolution.

May I say this? I noticed in the papers yesterday there was a conference at the White House, and it was stated that in that conference the President said the Budget would not be balanced and that we would have to have $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 more to balance the Budget—or more reductions in Government expenditures.

No man in this House has worked harder to balance the Budget than I have. I have not spared myself or my political welfare in any way, because I believe it is imperative for the good of the Nation that the Budget be balanced. I know that $1,118,000,000 of additional taxes levied on the people at this time is burdensome in the extreme, and, as far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of levying additional taxes to balance the Budget. [Applause.] I think the Budget should be balanced and it should be balanced by reducing expenditures [applause], and they should be reduced even if boards have to be abolished, even if Government activities have to be curtailed, even if you have to apply a blanket reduction to all the appropriations for governmental activities. The Budget must be balanced, but it should be balanced by further economies and not by levying additional taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman; and does not the gentleman believe that the Budget is balanced, provided the Secretary of the Treasury and his department gave the correct figures to the gentleman and the other conferees?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; and I will say to my friend that when the Ways and Means Committee was considering this bill we were told it required $1,240,000,000 to balance the Budget. We allowed for $200,000,000 of economies and then brought in a bill that the Treasury believed and we believed balanced the Budget. When this bill reached the Senate the Treasury said it would not balance the Budget, that the contemplated revenue did not reach the amount they expected by virtue of business not getting better, and stated it would take $235,000,000 more to balance the Budget. This is why your House conferees labored under a tremendous handicap in reaching an agreement on the tax bill. The Senate had added certain items to raise the revenue to balance the Budget and your conferees could not go out and bring in new matters to levy taxes on. We had to accept a number of the items levied by the Senate that produced large revenues or your Budget could not be balanced, and we took what we believed was the lesser of two evils. Some of the amendments we would not have otherwise accepted, but we accepted them in the national crisis, the national emergency, to balance the Budget.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the revenue that is provided in this bill to balance the Budget provide for the collection of the $270,000,000 payment on European debts owing to us, plus the 10 per cent on account of last year's moratorium?

Mr. CRISP. I can say to my friend that as far as we are concerned, in bringing in this bill, we expected the foreign governments to pay the amount due us under their solemn, sacred, international agreements, and so far as I am concerned, I shall never vote to scale them down one cent or vote for a further moratorium.

Mr. PARSONS. I agree with the gentleman perfectly and will ask the gentleman to yield for one more brief question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. In case they do not meet the payments there will be a deficit of $276,000,000.

Mr. CRISP. I think the gentleman is correct, but I can not believe that the nations who have entered into a solemn international agreement would repudiate that agreement. The trouble is that the international bankers have held out to them the hope that it might be scaled down. We put in the moratorium a section notifying the world that this Congress was not going to scale down the debts, and therefore I am expecting them to pay them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to say that I have given this resolution my careful attention, and I believe it to be sound legislation. It should have been in the original bill as passed by the House and the committee of conference. But, as the gentleman from Georgia has stated, it came up in such haste that we did not notice the error committed. It will save thirty to fifty million dollars to the Treasury, and I indorse all the gentleman from Georgia has said about it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. DOUGHTON. As I understand, information from the Treasury is that the Budget is not balanced.

Mr. CRISP. That was the statement in the paper yesterday, and that is all I know about it. I am in favor, if you have a deficit, of balancing the Budget by cutting expenditures and not by levying additional taxes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was the suggestion of the Treasury, but did they make any suggestion as to where the economies could be effected?

Mr. CRISP. No. I did not see any such statement.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think it is rather unusual to make that suggestion—that the Budget is not balanced—without making some suggestion as to where the economies could be made.

Mr. CRISP. As I said, all I know about it is what I read in the paper.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has said that the President did not state where these economies could be effected. The President has said that he will endeavor to make additional economies if the Congress will give him, the President, the authority he has been seeking since Congress convened.

Mr. CRISP. I will say that I have not sought any personal advantage; I have endeavored to serve my country; I have supported the President, and I will support him in any effort to bring about economies to balance the Budget and save four or five hundred million dollars to the taxpayers and thus lighten their burdens.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know whether the President can effect the economies, but I know that he has asked for the authority, and that if we give it that he is willing to try. I have gone along with the gentleman from Georgia, and it seems to me that we should give the President that authority. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] says that it is unusual for the President to say that the Budget is not balanced and not to advise how we can balance it. I say that we should give him the authority that he asks for.

Mr. CRISP. I am willing to go any length to balance the Budget without levying any more taxes. One billion one hundred and eighteen million dollars is a sufficient tax load for the people of this country now.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. There is nothing new about the fact that the Budget is not balanced. Is not it true that as the bill passed the Senate it was distinctly understood that the Budget was not balanced by $280,000,000?

Mr. CRISP. No; as it passed the Senate and the conferees the Treasury Department said that the Budget was balanced.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS. I agree with what the gentleman from Georgia has said. This is not the time to raise more taxes; and if it is necessary to balance the Budget it ought to be done by reduction of expenditures. But even if you were considering raising additional taxes, does not the gentleman think it would be much better to wait until the President has come to a fixed determination in his own mind how much is necessary, because in the space of one month the President raised his figures $321,000,000?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will further yield, I wish to add that the President seems to have abandoned his former nonpartisan view of this situation. In my judgment, the President could better have spent his time the other evening in calling in the Secretaries of the departments and the heads of the bureaus and demanding where they could cut the appropriations of their respective agencies than by calling in members of his own party and having a great discussion and then announcing to the country that we ought to reduce expenses another $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 without telling us where we could do it.

Mr. CRISP. Under the Constitution the duty rests with the House of Representatives to initiate legislation to pay the debts of the United States. That same sacred instrument places responsibility upon the Chief Executive to advise the Congress from time to time as to the state of the Union. I think before this House should consider levying any additional taxes the Executive should officially notify us to that effect and also point out some way whereby these taxes might be levied.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The first estimated deficit that was conveyed to the Ways and Means Committee was $920,000,000. Then the committee, upon its own initiative, requested a reexamination by the Secretary of the Treasury to determine if those figures should be revised and the deficit then was raised to $1,241,000,000. Later, when the bill went to the Senate, it was raised to around $1,460,000,000. Has the gentleman any information now as to what the latest estimated deficit for 1933 is?

Mr. CRISP. No. As I said before all I know about it is what I read in the newspaper.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not the gentleman think that the executive department ought to officially advise the Congress what the estimated deficit is?

Mr. CRISP. I think it will have to be done before this House will consider the subject matter.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did not that figure of $920,000,000 represent the deficit for the year 1931?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, no; $903,000,000 was the deficit for the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Conditions have been growing constantly worse in the country. The possibility of obtaining revenue has been constantly diminishing. It is true the revenue bill which we passed imposes increased taxes on incomes, both low and high. It is very doubtful in these times, with diminishing incomes, and particularly with the practical elimination of large incomes, whether those high rates will bring in what has been claimed for them.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with some of the remarks made by my friend, and I am not making any criticism at this time, but I think we ought to know definitely what the estimated deficit is at the present time for 1933 instead of being compelled to read the newspapers in the morning and hear of conferences being held. The Congress ought to receive definite information from the Executive Department as to what the estimated deficit for 1933 is. This is particularly so in view of recent statements appearing in the newspapers.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, so that there can be no misunderstanding about the figures, $903,000,000 and $920,000,000; $903,000,000 is the deficit for the fiscal year 1931. We started hearings on the revenue bill on January 13, this year, and at that time the President estimated it would require $920,000,000 to balance the Budget for the fiscal year 1933. After we had been in session for about three weeks, on February 9 the Secretary of the Treasury came in with revised figures and said it was necessary to raise $1,241,000,000 to balance the Budget for the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Did not the President's statement the other night perhaps have reference to the failure of the economy bill both in the Senate and the House?

Mr. CRISP. The way I read the statement, he said that there was a deficit which must be made up by additional taxes or economy. I am in favor of economies.

Mr. BACON. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the bill passed to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean on the discharge motion?

Mr. YON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. We will discuss the bonus bill to-morrow.

Mr. YON. But I shall not be in the city to-morrow.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Philippine independence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, after a third of a century of temporizing with this question of independence of the Philippines we can not be critical of the people of those islands if they have come to suspect that the late Senator Lodge, champion imperialist of the Spanish War days, expressed the true sentiment of our people when he said, as the treaty with Spain was being ratified by the Senate:

> We make no hypocritical pretense of being interested in the Filipinos solely for the good of others. While we regard these islands as a sacred trust, we regard the welfare of the United States first. We believe in trade expansion.

That was a frank, cheerless, comfortless statement hurled at a people who had, by force of arms, just been conquered by a powerful and independent nation—a nation builded upon the principles of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and looked to by the oppressed of all lands as the harbor and refuge of those who had the will to be free, and the courage and determination to bear the responsibilities that attach to independence.

With the passing of the years, the bluntness and harshness of Senator Lodge's statement were softened by the pronouncements of our Presidents and official spokesmen, of the commissions, of the investigators, all of whom gave honeyed assurances that the Filipinos were entitled to freedom, should have it, and always led them to believe that the promised land of independence was just around the corner. They must be a patient people, these Filipinos. They have been fighting for independence since the sixteenth century, and let it not be forgotten that they had achieved this goal, had bottled up Spanish rule to the single city of Manila and had swept their islands clear of the foreigner two years before the American occupation, so that we need not pride ourselves that we are giving these people independence; we are only restoring to them what they once had, even though that period of liberty was brief and short-lived.

Throughout the years of our occupation of their islands, the far-away pastures of liberty and self-determination have ever been distant but always green and an objective to be attained by the Filipinos. They have heard and silenced every argument used to deny them freedom. The organic law of the islands is the Jones Act of 1916. Under that they have improved their cities, built schools, increased their literacy and developed agriculture and industry. They evince such an interest in self-government that in recent elections 80 to 95 per cent of the registered voters go to the polls. Nine hundred of their municipalities are being administered practically exclusively by their own people and of the more than 20,000 civil service employees on the islands, less than 500 of these are now Americans. And what is not to be overlooked in these times is the fact that they have a balanced budget and a government that has been self-supporting since its establishment.

There was no more severe critic of the islands than the late Leonard Wood, their one-time governor; but in fairness to them, he said in one report:

> They [the elections] were the most orderely ever held on the islands. It can be stated that throughout the archipelago there were no serious disturbances. All parties admit the elections were fairly and honestly conducted. The number of complaints have been strikingly small.

I submit this is a badge of good conduct which many an American State might envy.

Now, what do we require of these people before they are to be given their independence, and what pledge have we made that they shall have it? Regardless of the utterances and promises of this Government during the first 15 years of our occupation, we did in 1916 write into the preamble of the Jones Act the specific and sacred pledge that they should be free. This preamble in part says:

> It was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest and aggrandizement, and * * * it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the people of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established.

I maintain that a stable government has been established. This very Jones law, under which the islands govern themselves to a very large extent, has been the proving ground of their ability to take their place among the free nations of the world, and we as a democracy can no longer deny them their inalienable right to freedom. How much longer must a people crying for liberty and entitled to it wait for this Government to say the word? Must they each and all become "rugged individualists," the cherished type of our Chief Executive? Or is this another "noble experiment" in democracy that has already run for 30 years and may run for 30 more unless we acknowledge that there is such a thing as international honesty and that we have a binding pledge to redeem?

As a foster mother we have guided the Filipinos through a generation the like of which has never been experienced. At close hand they have been enabled to observe how the American Republic functions in times of prosperity as well as in periods of Democratic "panics" and even Republican "depressions." They have had ample opportunity to observe our 10-year excursion into the abridgment of personal liberty—I mean prohibition—and they have had equal opportunity to weigh the results.

There across the Pacific they must stand with tongues in cheeks, nodding knowingly as they are tempted to come to the conclusion that their dawning independence is not the result that we have pledged them freedom, but rather because of financial and economic conditions which now would indicate that for our own interests it might be well to let the islands go.

There was a day when we saw the Philippines as a treasure to be coveted and retained. Now we are not so sure. The cry is going up from agriculturists and capitalists that we free the islands and that high tariff walls be thrown up to protect American products because under the present arrangement there is free trade between us. These are factors, although many deny it, that are counting heavily in the apparent growing sentiment to give the islands liberty. Is it possible that these wards of ours shall eventually come to the conclusion that the way to Uncle Sam's heart is through his pocketbook?

While I should very much prefer not to consider the question of Philippine independence from a dollar and cents view at all, but purely from a motive of justice and national honor, nevertheless I do not believe that it can be denied that the friendships which this Nation will establish, not only among the Asiatic peoples but among the yellow, black, and brown races all over the globe, by this act of magnanimity will redound to the future generations of our people in commercial dealings a thousandfold greater in value than the retention of these islands themselves.

The example of a branch of the Anglo-Saxon race in the height of its power, freely releasing sovereignty over a foreign possession without any outside pressure whatsoever, but purely from a sense of justice and a desire to see every people who earnestly yearn for liberty and are willing to prepare themselves for it freed from alien domination, will unquestionably establish this Nation among the nations of the globe as one that is safe to trust and worthy of confidence.

Are we to have the only voice in saying when these people shall be free? Are not the people themselves to be considered? Can we completely and entirely thrust an occidental civilization on an oriental race? They have Christianity; that was one thing Spain gave to them and left with them, and they have assimilated American ideals and methods.

Let us admit that these people of another race have stood the test of time and that they are entitled to their freedom when and how they want it. Let us cast aside the economic and the military factors that enter into the question, and as for the latter it will be debatable long after we have left the islands whether we should or should not have retained them for military and naval purposes. To continue to deny these people their independence will be construed through the ages as an act of bad faith. Let us stand on our pledge and give them their freedom.

PROGRAM FOR THE AFTERNOON

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on the afternoon's program.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the afternoon program?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to address myself to some matters that are coming up in the afternoon program.

Mr. MICHENER. What is the afternoon program?

Mr. BLANTON. Some District bills that will come up this afternoon.

Mr. MICHENER. If the District Committee does not object, I shall not.

Mr. BACON. Does not the gentleman think that the gentlewoman from New Jersey ought to have an opportunity to present her bills?

Mr. BLANTON. I think she will do it with much more expedition if the gentleman will allow me to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BACON. If the gentleman will promise to expedite the matter, I will withdraw any objection I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on two former District days there was being considered a bill known as the Bowman bill, which is a bad bill in many particulars. Exercising our rights under our oaths, in the performance of our duty, my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who is a member of that committee, and I pointed out certain provisions of that bill that ought not to become law and we showed it was a bad bill.

I offered to substitute for it a bill known as the Blaine bill, which has been carefully worked out and which has passed the Senate unanimously, and which when amended in two particulars, is a good bill. If that request had been granted, the Blaine bill would have been passed and it would have been signed by this time and would have been the law, but there was an attempt made to push the Bowman bill through. I blocked it, and it is blocked yet, and I will do everything within my power to continue to block it, for I do not believe it ever will pass the Congress.

Now, concerning that bill, I want to show you what the Washington Herald said about it editorially the next morning. It said:

Mr. BLANTON has rendered a service in preventing the passage of the Bowman bill for the regulation of the sale of securities in the District of Columbia. It is unfortunate that the District Committee did not substitute for the Bowman bill the Blaine bill, dealing with the subject, which has already unanimously passed the Senate. It is a real "blue sky" act, affording a far greater degree of protection to investors than the House bill. If the Blaine bill had been accepted, as it should have been, this legislation would have been awaiting the President's signature by this time. Mr. BLANTON blocked the Bowman bill.

That is an editorial from the Washington Herald. So you see it behooves the House and it behooves the country and even the people of the District, for Members to watch these bills and stop them when they ought not to pass.

I wish you might see the bunch of letters I have received from citizens of the District of Columbia approving my act in stopping the Bowman bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am sorry I can not. I only have five minutes and I do not want to take up more time of the House. I am just going to read one letter that is typical of all of them, because this is a copy of a letter that was addressed to the chairman of the committee. It is written from 2333 Nebraska Avenue, Washington, D. C., May 23, 1932, and addressed to the chairman of the committee, Mrs. MARY T. NORTON, and it says:

While I regret the failure of some of the bills in yesterday's budget, yet I feel that their loss is more than compensated by the failure of the amazing securities bill. I have been wholly unable to see the merit in that bill. On the contrary, to my mind it sanctions the evil practices which are notorious here, and I believe elsewhere, since it is an era of mishandled securities, which makes them no securities. I sincerely hope the bill will never receive the sanction of Congress. It is too amazing that it could emerge from the committee.

I speak as a taxpayer and a long-time resident.

Very truly yours,

(Miss) MARY E. LAZENBY.

Now, as far as the group of bills closing streets and the two bills of my good friend the gentlemen from Kentucky, Judge GILBERT, are concerned, they ought to be passed, and passed hurriedly. They are good bills. As far as the Buzzards Point bill is concerned, it is a good bill, and it ought to pass. As far as the railway extension bill is concerned, it is a good bill, and it ought to pass. As far as the barber Sunday closing bill is concerned, which closes barber shops on Sundays, it is a good bill, and it ought to pass.

I stated frankly to the committee on former District days that if they would take up these good bills and pass them they could pass them without any trouble at all; but they should not have taken up a controversial matter like the Bowman measure, which we have blocked; and if that committee will drop that Bowman bill and ask unanimous consent to take up these good bills, they will not have a bit of trouble in the world; but if they seek to take up the Bowman bill, they will have just as much trouble as ever, because as long as I am a Member of the House I am going to try to block that bill, and all other bad bills it reports here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. McGUGIN. I object.

EXTENSION OF TRACKS OF PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE & WASHINGTON RAILROAD CO. IN CONNECTION WITH BUZZARDS POINT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12115) to authorize the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. to extend its present track connection with the United States navy yard so as to provide adequate railroad facilities in connection with the development of Buzzards Point as an industrial area in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not—this is a bill which ought to pass, and is a good bill, and I shall not object.

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an identical Senate bill, S. 4736, be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. is hereby authorized to establish a switch connection with the existing track siding leading from Second and I Streets SE. to and into the United States navy yard, at a point in said siding south of M Street SE.; thence running over and across the northwest corner of United States reservation 17 E, at present controlled and occupied by the United States Navy Department for navy yard and ordnance storage purposes; thence over, across, and through square 743 to First Street SE.; thence southward on First Street SE. to and thence along Potomac Avenue to the west line of Second Street SW., with all necessary switches, extensions, turnouts, and sidings and such other track extensions through and along One-half Street SW., One-half Street SE., and Second Street SW., south of Potomac Avenue and north of Potomac Avenue to P Street as may be or become necessary for the establishment of adequate railroad facilities in connection with the development of Buzzards Point as an industrial area in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to sell and transfer or to lease to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., its successors and/or assigns, upon such terms and for such amount as he may deem to be both just and reasonable, the existing railroad track connection with the United States navy yard as constructed and established under authority conferred by an act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes": Provided, That the title to any right of way or property provided by the United States for the purposes of such construction and now occupied by said track connection shall remain in the United States: And provided further, That said track connection, in so far as the requirements of the United States Navy Yard may be affected, at all times shall be maintained and operated by said railroad company, its successors or assigns, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 3. Said railroad company is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate branch tracks, spurs, or sidings into any lot or square now or hereafter zoned for industrial or second commercial use abutting upon any street or avenue over and along which said railroad company is hereby specifically authorized to lay and operate tracks, and also to construct tracks to serve any wharf which may be established on the Anacostia River: Provided, That the construction of all such railroad tracks and appurtenant turnouts, branch tracks, and sidings, in all respects and things, shall be subject to the prior approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia after report by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, such approval to be noted upon identical copies of a suitably prepared plat or chart, one copy to be kept on file in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia and the other thereof to be kept on file in the office of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

SEC. 4. Subject always to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, all such railroad tracks, turnouts, branch tracks, spurs, and sidings may be located and constructed in, upon, along, and through public grounds, space, and streets of the United States and/or of the District of Columbia as same are now or hereafter may be located and established: Provided, That except as herein expressly authorized no tracks, turnouts, branches, spurs, or sidings shall be constructed along or through South Capitol Street or First Street SW. in the north and south direction, at grade or otherwise, but each of said streets, with prior approval of said Commissioners of the District of Columbia, may be crossed to such extent as may be necessary for the establishment of adequate railroad facilities: Provided further, That no permit for the construction of tracks, turnouts, branches, spurs, or sidings shall be issued with respect to squares 600, 602, 604, 606, 608, 610, and 612, or any of said squares, until the particular square or squares for which a permit is sought shall have been zoned industrial: And provided further, That the plans for any building fronting on Canal Street from the Anacostia River to P Street SW. shall have the approval of the Fine Arts Commission as to height and design.

SEC. 5. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or abridging the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1927 (44 Stat. L. 1353), entitled "An act to provide for the elimination of grade crossings of steam railroads in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

SEC. 6. The Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., its successors or assigns, is hereby authorized to acquire any land or property other than public grounds, space, or streets of the United States or the District of Columbia necessary or expedient for right of way for said track extensions, turnouts, branch tracks, spurs, sidings, and connections by purchase or condemnation. In event that said company, its successors or assigns, shall be unable to acquire any piece or parcel of land necessary or expedient for any of the purposes indicated in this act, at a price deemed by it to be reasonable, then, and in such event the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., its successors and assigns, is authorized to acquire the same by condemnation proceedings to be instituted in its own name by petition filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for the ascertainment of its value, in accordance with the provisions of sections 483 to 491, inclusive of Chapter XV of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," as amended by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1929, entitled "An act to amend Chapter XV of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes" (45 Stat. L. 1437), so far as the same may be applicable.

SEC. 7. If and when the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall decide to pave or repave any of the streets over or along which tracks are authorized to be constructed, the railroad company shall be required to bear the expense of the paving and/or repairs to pavements between the rails and on either side of the tracks for a distance of 2 feet.

SEC. 8. The authority to establish, construct, acquire, maintain, and operate the tracks, switch connections, extensions, turnouts, sidings, branches, spurs, and other facilities provided for in this act is given upon the following conditions, to wit: The said facilities shall be open to any and all freight traffic by rail whether originating within or without the District of Columbia either on the said the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. or any other common carrier railroad, upon such just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory rates, terms, and conditions as may be embraced in public tariffs, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Coommission as provided for other rates under the provisions of the interstate commerce act: Provided, That no greater charge shall be made for deliveries to be made upon said facilities than is or are or may be made for delivery of like traffic consigned for delivery at any other delivery point on the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. in the District of Columbia; special, free, or reduced rates or charges for deliveries of property consigned to the United States or any of its departments, bureaus, or subordinate branches or to or for use of the municipality of the District of Columbia not included: And provided further, That any common carrier by railroad now or hereafter authorized to operate in the District of Columbia shall, upon application to and approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission, be permitted to use jointly all such facilities as provided in this act on such terms and for such compensation as may be prescribed by the said Interstate Commerce Commission in accordance with the provisions of the interstate commerce act, as amended.

SEC. 9. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved without regard to any payments required or agreements established under its terms.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

My purpose in making the motion is to inquire whether the Senate bill has incorporated in it the amendments as found in section 4 of the House bill?

The statement has been made that the Senate bill is identical with the House bill.

Mr. BLACK. I compared the two bills the other day and found them identical.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the Senate bill carry the amendments of the House bill? I refer to section 4.

Mr. BLACK. The two bills are the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. That being so, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 12115, was laid on the table.

CLOSING OF CERTAIN STREETS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12096) to authorize the closing of certain streets in the District of Columbia rendered useless or unnecessary, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object because this is the Buzzard Point bill, which is a good bill.

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 4689) may be substituted and considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire whether the Senate bill is identical with the House bill? Does it contain the committee amendments as reported?

Mrs. NORTON. I think the gentleman will find they are identical.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can any member of the committee give the assurance that it is identical so that we do not have to follow the reading closely?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; the two bills are identical.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, referring to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the amendments in the House bill at the bottom of section 3 and at the bottom of section 4 by all means ought to be in the Senate bill, because they are safeguards.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall follow the bill as it is read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close, upon the recommendation of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, that portion of U Street SW. lying between First Street and Half Street SW., as may be rendered useless or unnecessary by reason of the construction of an electric light and power plant on squares 665 and 667 adjoining said street: Provided, That the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall sell to the abutting property owners the land contained within the portion of said street to be closed, for cash, at a price not less than the assessed value of contiguous lots, and the money received therefrom paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia, and that such lands shall thereafter be assessed on the books of the assessor of the District of Columbia the same in all respects as other private properties in the District.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby further authorized to close, upon the recommendation of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, that portion of Water Street between U and V Streets SW.; and said commissioners are hereby authorized to give title to the owners of square 667 abutting on Water Street that portion of Water Street so closed lying west of the direct southerly projection of the west line of Half Street as now existing north of U Street SW., upon notification from the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital of the receipt from all claimants in absolute quitclaim deeds to the United States of all land in square east of 667, east of the direct southerly projection of the west line of Half Street, as now existing north of U Street SW., and such other land as may be acquired by the owners of square 667 in square east of south of 667, subject to the right of said owners to construct and operate any pipe lines and intake and discharge tunnels in or under the same to the Anacostia River, and provided that all of said lands deeded to private owners by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under this section shall thereafter be assessed on the books of the assessor of the District of Columbia the same in all respects as other private properties in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to grant any and all permits for the construction and operation of any pipe lines and intake and discharge tunnels in or under the public streets, roads, and highways south of T Street SW. and east of Second Street SW. to the Anacostia River as may become necessary in the construction, installation, and operation of any electric lighting and power plant, provided the same will not interfere with the development of other property located within this area.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the construction and operation of any intake and discharge tunnels and/or other structures in the Anacostia River in so far as they affect navigable waters of the United States; and that the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized, in consideration of the above-mentioned quitclaims to the United States, to convey, on behalf of the United States, to the owners of square 667 that portion of square east of 667 lying west of the direct southerly projection of the west line of Half Street as now existing north of U Street SW.; and that said Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized to permit the construction and operation of any pipe lines and intake and discharge tunnels, upon such terms and conditions as shall be fair and reasonable, under and on any lands owned or claimed by the Government of the United States lying in the above area and/or between the east line of Water Street, or other streets, and the Anacostia River. All areas conveyed by the United States to the owners of square 667 shall thereafter be assessed on the books of the assessor of the District of Columbia the same in all respect as other private properties in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The report on this bill and on another bill providing for closing of streets do not contain the letter of recommendation by the District Commissioners. In one of these minor bills I noticed a report from the committee that did contain the letter of recommendation; but the bill as reported did not carry out, maybe inadvertently, the recommendations of the commissioners.

I think it is better practice to have the letter of the commissioners embodied in the report, so that Members scrutinizing the bill may be able to get at first hand the opinion of the commissioners without merely having the addendum at the end that the bill has the approval of the commissioners and of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. In the report I think the gentleman will find a letter from the commissioners signed by L. H. Reichelderfer, president of the Board of Commissioners.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report accompanying this bill (H. R. 12096) is Report No. 1393, which I have in my hand, and it does not contain any specific letter from the District commissioners. I am merely referring to the practice and stating that it is better to have the letter of the commissioners embodied in the report.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 12096) was laid on the table.

OPENING AND CLOSING OF ROADS WITHIN THE BOUNDARIES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WORKHOUSE AT OCCOQUAN, VA.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 1768, to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va., and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BANKHEAD). The lady from New Jersey calls up Senate bill 1768, and asks unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the bill reported in order to see what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to convey to the State of Virginia, or to the county of Fairfax in said State, a strip of land 50 feet wide to be used as a public thoroughfare running southerly for a distance of approximately 1,700 feet from the Fairfax Courthouse Road to the Telegraph Road in Fairfax County, Va., as shown on map No. 1595, filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the State of Virginia, or the county of Fairfax in said State, shall convey to the District of Columbia for private use as part of the workhouse property a portion of Telegraph Road running southwesterly for a distance of approximately 900 feet from the Fairfax Courthouse Road to the 50-foot strip herein authorized to be conveyed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as shown on map No. 1595, filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to take a few moments of the time of the House to refer to the matter of balancing the Budget. I do not think there is anything new in the President's statement that the Budget is not balanced.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas is going to start a controversial political question that may need answering. If there should be general debate during this District day he could do that in general debate, but it is not permissible under the 5-minute rule. I just want it understood that if the gentleman starts a political question here that needs answering it may be necessary to answer it.

Mr. McGUGIN. I did not suppose there was any subject that could be touched here on which the gentleman from Texas would not want to horn in.

Mr. BLANTON. I am here to horn in on every question of importance that comes up before the House.

Mr. McGUGIN. Everyone will agree with the gentleman in that statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas will proceed in order.

Mr. McGUGIN. I think it is quite clear and distinctly understood that the Budget was not balanced. I want to invite the attention of the House to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 31, page 12050, and particularly to a few questions and answers in the Senate about five minutes before the final roll call on the revenue bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah how much revenue we have provided to-day by what we have done?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe it is $281,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. What economies must we exercise, then, in order to fully balance the Budget?

Mr. SMOOT. Approximately $300,000,000.

With that question asked by the Senator from New York, and with that frank answer from the Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, I think it was clearly understood that the Budget was not balanced and would not be balanced unless Congress effected $300,000,000 of savings. Therefore the President is not taking any unfair advantage of the Congress when he now calls the attention of the Congress and the country to the fact that this Congress has not yet had the courage to meet its constitutional duty to provide sufficient revenue to maintain this Government. Least of all, Congress need express no surprise to find that it has not yet performed its plain duty. Congress knew when it passed the revenue bill it had not balanced the Budget. Congress knew the Budget would not be balanced until Congress had the moral courage to reduce expenses $300,000,000. Congress must either reduce expenses $300,000,000 or levy more taxes, or leave the Government an insolvent institution to the extent of $300,000,000. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, while the House has passed the Hare bill, granting independence to the Philippines, as yet the Senate has taken no action on the measure. But those who would have us retain the Philippines permanently, or for an indefinite period, are not idle. They are preaching the insidious doctrine of delay, and industriously endeavoring to marshal opinion both in and out of Congress against the enactment of any legislation at this session looking to the early independence of the Philippines.

In view of this cynical attitude, if not actually inspired at least sanctioned by the Hoover administration, the friends of Philippine independence must not be overconfident or indifferent to the widespread propaganda that seeks to discredit, delay, and ultimately defeat the fulfillment of our pledge to grant early and complete independence to these insular wards. I consider this one of the most important issues before the American people; and until a bill establishing the sovereignty of the Philippines has become law, I will not remain silent on the subject.

I regret that my views on the Philippine question do not meet with the approval of some of my colleagues and a few American publicists. It is not pleasant to differ from those whom we respect and hold in high esteem. But a great principle is at stake, and our final decision with reference to the Philippines will have a far-reaching effect. An important question of national policy is involved. We are standing at the forks of the road. We are being subjected to an acid test. Our Republic was founded on the principle that no nation has the right to hold another nation or people in political servitude. To this doctrine all Americans subscribe. Thirteen million Filipinos are making to us the same passionate appeal for political freedom that we made to Great Britain prior to the American Revolution.

Now, are we sincere when we proclaim our devotion to the principles and policies on which our free institutions are founded? Are we going to deny to the Filipino the same degree and kind of freedom we enjoy? Can we convincingly argue that self-government is a good thing for Americans but a bad thing for the Filipinos? In politics and statecraft it is a fundamental maxim to be consistent, and those who would have the United States Government indefinitely or permanently hold the Philippines are not bedecked with the rare and radiant jewels of consistency.

If we seek a just and permanent settlement of the Philippine problem, we must beware of the Janus politicians who have one face toward ultimate but long-delayed Filipino independence and another face toward imperialism and the permanent retention of the Philippines by the United States. Sometimes vice dons the robes of virtue, error wears the trappings of truth, and not infrequently despotism borrows the livery of freedom in order to accomplish their sinister purpose. Moreover, many of the most militant opponents of Philippine independence have financial or commercial axes to grind.

By denying self-government to the Philippines we will establish a dangerous precedent and sanction a policy which will brand us as apostates to the gospel of freedom, on which our Republic is founded. Once we depart from the faith of our fathers and discard the exalted principles and lofty ideals that have inspired and dominated our national life we thereby plant in our body politic a malignant germ that may perchance slumber for decades or generations, and then incubate a train of calamities that may make beggars, slaves, or savages of our posterity.

No one can with any degree of certainty forecast the changes the next century may make in the map of the world, or what governments, great and small, will survive the rust and ravages of the oncoming years. Some of the nations that now exert a potential influence in world affairs may bite the dust and be destroyed. Kingdoms may become republics, and republics be transformed into despotisms. Even our own National Union is not immune from the disintegrating forces that travel with time. The blighting and blistering curse of fascism, bolshevism, communism, and anarchy may palsy our Government, and a Lenin,

Stalin, Pilsudski, Primo de Rivera, or Mussolini may rule our people with an iron hand. And perchance—though God forbid—some future historian may record the melancholy fact that our once glorious Republic was overthrown by sedition, revolution, or foreign aggression, and that a lineal descendant of a Chicago gunman or racketeer established a despotism on the ruins of our free institutions, and by strong-arm methods installed himself in the White House as the autocrat of all the Americas.

While our people are now strong and mighty, the time may come in future generations when, beset by foes within and without, facing grave dangers and fearing destruction, we will cry out to the posterity of our present insular wards for help, and myriad millions of brown-skinned citizens of a puissant Filipino Republic, realizing our desperation and profoundly grateful to us for our benefactions to them in the past, will stretch their nimble hands across the sea to aid, succor, and sustain us in our national vicissitudes.

No, my colleagues; we can not afford to adopt a policy toward the Filipino that is not absolutely right, just, and in harmony with the professions and promises heretofore made. We must consider the future. Racial hatreds are easily engendered and difficult to uproot. Holding the Philippines permanently, or for an indefinite term of years, without an unequivocal assurance of ultimate independence at a definite time, will be productive of infinite harm, and will kindle in the hearts of the Filipinos the fierce flames of unquenchable hatred. No temporary advantages that might accrue to us by keeping the Philippines can outweigh the calamities that such a policy would bring on us or our posterity.

My countrymen, we must not indulge in any sharp practice in our dealings with our insular wards. It is beneath our dignity as a nation to overreach the Filipinos or drive a sharp bargain with them. Both self-respect and self-interest dictate that we keep faith with the 13,000,000 people, who, by the sudden shiftings of human events, passed under our guardianship. Let us deal with them unselfishly, generously, and justly, as becometh a mighty nation, conscious of its prowess but actuated by no base motive. By such a course we will win the approval of our national conscience, tremendously augment our power, and extend our influence as a self-respecting, right-thinking, right-acting nation. The rule of right is the only rule of action for nations as well as individuals. We will gain nothing and lose much by traveling any other path. As a nation we can easily be undone by the improper, unwise, unethical, and unjust use of our great wealth and power.

Claudius Cæsar, when he held Caractacus and his vassal lords chained to the wheels of his war chariot, spoke less contemptuously of the conquered Britons than the small, leather-lunged and empire-minded group of Americans speak of the Filipinos. They look upon the Philippines as a rich field for exploitation and see in the Filipino only an untamed and untutored denizen of an island jungle, whom they would have us believe is unappreciative of liberty and wholly unfit to exercise the functions of self-government.

In one breath the opposition to Philippine independence, with great eloquence, energy, and ingenuity, argue that the Filipinos are obviously incapable of self-government, and in the next breath they say independence is not a live issue, because the Filipinos are already enjoying almost unlimited self-government; that they now have the substance of self-government and are making all this fuss about its shadow. Those who are so vociferous in opposing self-government for the Philippines are remarkably proficient in the delicate arts of meek evasion and shuffling subterfuge.

Next to my obligations to my God and my two devoted sons comes my duty to my native land and its free institutions. My spirit is active and my inclinations are warm in the interests of my country. I would not knowingly do or say anything inimical to its interests, and I crave at all times the opportunity to do something that will strengthen its institutions and add luster to its hitherto unparalleled and untarnished accomplishments. To effectuate this purpose I will ever strive to keep your and my country from doing aught that is little, shortsighted, insincere, inconsistent, time-serving, or unethical. In our contact with the outside world, whether we touch elbows with a mighty nation or with a feeble folk, may my country never adopt questionable means to accomplish its purposes or augment its power or overstep the well-defined path of rectitude or be insensible to the high ideals and noble impulses on which it has already built enduring influence and deathless glory.

Cæsar lost his sword in the Battle of Gergovia. After the subjugation of Gaul, he saw the sword suspended in a Gaulish temple. "Let it stay there," he said; "it has been sanctified." The American and Filipino blood shed in the Philippines during the unhappy insurrection 30 years ago has united the two races and sanctified and cemented a friendship between their own peoples that must be maintained as long as time lasts and the seasons come and go. We have lost no swords in the Philippines that we wish to reclaim.

We do not, and must not, look upon these islands as a conquered province, or as spoils of war, or fruits of victory. By the fortunes of war they were unexpectedly thrown into our lap. We accepted them as trustees, intending and promising to hold them only until the Filipinos qualified for self-government. While not so expressed, we were in fact transfer agents or the conduit through which the sovereignty of the islands was to pass from Spain to the native inhabitants. It is now time to terminate this trust and restore these islands to their rightful owners.

The fears that the Filipinos will abuse and not appreciate their independence are born of misinformation. These apprehensions are not the fruits of reason and common sense, or consonant with human experience. Wrestling with the problems incident to self-government will sharpen the wit, mature the judgment, and strengthen the hands of the Filipinos. The time has come for action; for, after all, actions, not theories, blaze out national trails, establish the landmark of progress, and set in motion the slow but certain and resistless forces of destiny.

CLOSING OF QUINTANA PLACE

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 3911, to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close Quintana Place, between Seventh Street and Seventh Place NW., and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The lady from New Jersey calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the bill to which I adverted a moment ago. The bill in its present form does not conform with the recommendation of the commissioners. The commissioners say they have no objection to the enactment of this bill if payment is made to the District for the cost of moving and relocating the water main. I have prepared an amendment which I think meets the recommendation of the commissioners, to be inserted after the word "authorized," in line 4. The amendment reads as follows:

On condition that the expense of moving and relocating the water main now existing be borne by the adjoining property owner and without other expense to the District of Columbia.

If that amendment is accepted, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close Quintana Place, between Seventh Street and Seventh Place NW., running through square 3160 in the District of Columbia, dedicated as a public highway by plat recorded December 23, 1925, and recorded in book No. 80, page 173, of the records of the surveyor of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the title to the land lying within the area hereby closed shall revert to the proprietor of the adjoining blocks, the land in the said dedication never having been improved or used as a highway.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. After the word "authorized" in line 4, page 1, insert the following:

On condition that the expense of moving and relocating the water main now existing be borne by the adjoining property owner and without other expense to the District of Columbia.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman should reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not take instructions from the gentleman from Florida. The amendment is in writing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," insert "on condition that the expense of moving and relocating the water main now existing be borne by the adjoining property owner and without other expense to the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3929) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close certain alleys and to set aside land owned by the District of Columbia for alley purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close certain alleys and to set aside land owned by the District of Columbia for alley purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby authorized to close the alley in square 2740, abutting lots 9 to 14, both inclusive, and extending east from the 16-foot alley in said square; to close the alleys in square 3268 extending south from Sheridan Street to the 20-foot alley running east and west through said square, and to close all that portion of the alley 10 feet wide in square 4541 abutting lots 803 and 804, and extending northerly from Rosedale Street to the 10-foot alley running east and west in said square, the District of Columbia being the owner of all the property abutting on said alleys herein authorized to be closed in said squares 2740, 3268, and 4541 and the said commissioners are further authorized to close any alleys or parts of alleys in the District of Columbia when, in their judgment, such alleys, or parts of alleys, are rendered useless and unnecessary by reason of the acquisition of abutting land for municipal purposes: Provided, That the District of Columbia, prior to the closing of any such alley or part of alley, has acquired title to all the land abutting on the alley or part of alley proposed to be closed: Provided further, That the title to the land comprised in the alleys or parts of alleys so closed shall revert to the District of Columbia: And provided further, That no property owner within the block where such alleys or parts of alleys are closed shall be deprived the right of access to his property by alleys or parts of alleys, unless adequate access to such property be substituted therefor.

SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby further authorized to set aside for alley purposes any land owned by the District of Columbia whenever it becomes necessary to provide additional area for alleys by reason of the closing of any alley or part of any alley: Provided, That in each case the area set aside for alley purposes shall not exceed the area of the alley or part of alley closed.

SEC. 3. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cause public notice to be given, by advertisement in a newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, of any order to be made by the said commissioners under the authority granted them by the provisions of this act: Provided, That such public notice shall be given not less than 30 days prior to the effective date of such order: And provided further, That if any interested property owner affected adversely by such order shall request a public hearing by the said commissioners, within 30 days prior to the effective date of the order, the said commissioners shall grant such hearing.

SEC. 4. That any and all necessary maps showing the action taken by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act shall be prepared by the surveyor of the District of Columbia, approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and ordered by said commissioners to be recorded in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLOSING OF CERTAIN STREETS AND ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4106) to provide for the closing of certain streets and alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act to provide for the closing of certain streets and alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close R Street for its full width from the east boundary of parcel 224/27 to the west building line of Sixteenth Street; to close Fifteenth Street for its full width from the north line of R Street to the southeasterly building line of Fairlawn Avenue; to close part of Q Street abutting lot 23 in square 5598; to close all public alleys in square 5598, and to close the public alley 16 feet wide in square 5604 extending south from R Street to the south line of lots 101 and 802 in said square 5604, all in the southeast section of the District of Columbia, the ground within the lines of the parts of streets and alleys so closed to revert to the District of Columbia for use for school purposes: Provided, That the owners of all property abutting on the parts of streets and alleys so closed shall consent to such closing.

SEC. 2. That Q Street, located within the boundaries of parcel 224/7 and extending from the west line of Sixteenth Street to the southeasterly line of Fairlawn Avenue, and R Street, located within the boundaries of parcel 224/27, extending from the east building line of Fourteenth Street to the east boundary of said parcel 224/27, are hereby removed from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The proviso of section 1 is somewhat ambiguous. The closing of these streets and alleys for school purposes is contingent, as the proviso states, on the owners of all property abutting on the streets and alleys so closed consenting to such closing. The query arose in my mind as to the extent it was proposed to have the consent given. Is it intended that every person living on this R Street shall give consent before the closing of the street shall take place?

Mrs. NORTON. Certainly. They have been notified.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not a map of the property intended to be condemned and yet the proviso is so broad it may extend to so many owners that it would be impossible to get the consent of all. I do not know whether it is the intention of the framers of the legislation to have it so extensive or not.

Mr. BLANTON. The consent has already been obtained.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the case, of course, there is no reason for my making further inquiry. I was only fearful it might be so extensive that it would not provide a working provision.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say to the gentleman that all of the owners have been notified and their consent has been secured.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

READJUSTMENT OF STREET LINES AND TRANSFER OF LAND FOR SCHOOL AND OTHER PURPOSES

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11364) to provide for readjustment of street lines and the transfer of land for school, park, and highway purposes, in the northeast section of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill, S. 4396, may be substituted for the House bill, and the Senate bill considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 4396

An act to provide for readjustment of street lines and the transfer of land for school, park, and highway purposes, in the northeast section of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for a readjustment of street lines and for the transfer of lands for school, park, and highway purposes in the territory lying south of Riggs Road between First Street and Rock Creek Church Road Northeast, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close the part of Ingraham Street and part of Riggs Road lying within the parcels designated B, C, and E, as shown on map numbered 1672 on file in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, the title to the land comprised within said parcels designated B and E to revert to the District of Columbia for school purposes, and the title to the land comprised within said parcel designated C to be transferred to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital for park purposes. And the said commissioners are further authorized and directed to close that portion of First Street Northeast lying between the south line of Riggs Road and the north line of Ingraham Street, and to transfer title to the portion of First Street so closed to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital for park purposes.

SEC. 2. That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia all of the land comprised within the parcels designated A and F, as shown on said map numbered 1672, the title to the land comprised within said parcel designated A to revert to the District of Columbia for school purposes, and the title to the land comprised within said parcel designated F to revert to the District of Columbia for highway purposes.

SEC. 3. The land comprised within the parcel designated D as shown on said map numbered 1672 is hereby authorized and directed to be abandoned as school property, and the said commissioners shall transfer said parcel designated D to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital for park purposes.

SEC. 4. The surveyor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to prepare the necessary plat or plats showing all parcels of land to be transferred, and portions of streets to be closed and transferred, in accordance with the provisions of this act, with a certificate affixed thereon to be signed by the authorized officials representing the Government agencies designated, after which said plat or plats shall be recorded upon the order of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia; and said plat or plats, when duly recorded in said office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, shall constitute a legal closing of streets and transfer of property for the purposes as set forth in the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 11364, was laid on the table.

CLOSING BARBER SHOPS ONE DAY IN SEVEN

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8290, providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, S. 4023, an identical Senate bill, be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether the Senate bill conforms to the original House bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. I may say that the committee adopted the Senate bill and recommended the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but I asked whether the Senate bill is identical with the House bill. Do I understand that the committee amendment in the House bill is in the Senate bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the bill temporarily.

INCORPORATION OF CREDIT UNIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 1153, to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc.—

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "District of Columbia credit unions act."

DEFINITION

SEC. 2. A credit union is hereby defined to be a cooperative society organized for the purpose of promoting thrift among its members and creating a source of credit for them for provident purposes.

ORGANIZATION CERTIFICATE

SEC. 3. Any seven or more persons, who are actual residents of, or do business or are employed within, the District of Columbia, and who desire to form a credit union, shall subscribe before some officer in the District competent to take the acknowledgment of deeds, an organization certificate which shall specifically state—

First. The name of the corporation, which shall include the words "credit union" and "District of Columbia."

Second. The names and addresses of the subscribers to the certificate and the number of shares subscribed by each.

Third. The par value of the shares of the credit union, which shall not exceed $10 each.

Fourth. The proposed field of membership, specified in such detail as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may require.

Fifth. The term of the credit union's existence, which may be perpetual.

POWER OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT

SEC. 4. The organization certificate shall be presented to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who may, in their discretion, approve the certificate. The said commissioners are hereby authorized to refer any such proposed certificate to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall, within a reasonable time, submit a report to the said commissioners with respect (1) to the conformity of the certificate to the provisions of this act, (2) the general character and fitness of the subscribers, and (3) the advisability of establishing a credit union in the proposed field of membership.

RECORDING CERTIFICATE

SEC. 5. The certificate, if approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall be filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, and shall be recorded by him. At such time as the approved certificate is so filed, the subscribers and their successors shall thereupon become a body corporate, and as such shall, subject to the limitations of section 8 (relating to approval of by-laws), be vested with all the powers and charged with all the liabilities conferred and imposed by this act upon corporations organized thereunder as credit unions: Provided, That the last paragraph of section 552 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia shall have no application to credit unions.

SUPERVISION BY COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY

SEC. 6. The provisions of sections 713 and 714 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, as now or hereafter amended (relating to supervision by the Comptroller of the Currency of banking institutions in the District of Columbia), shall apply to credit unions, except that the Comptroller of the Currency may relieve credit unions from compliance with any such requirements to such extent and in such manner as he deems will not prejudice the proper conduct of the affairs of such credit unions: Provided, however, That the publication of reports named in section 713 shall not be required of credit unions having assets of less than $100,000 and fees incident to making the examinations specified in section 714 shall not exceed a basic fee of $5 and 3 cents per $1,000 of assets per annum: Provided, however, That it shall be unlawful for any such credit union to transact business in the District of Columbia without procuring a license from the District of Columbia; and all such credit unions shall pay a license tax of $15 per annum to the District of Columbia. No license shall be granted for a period longer than one year: Provided, however, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may suspend or revoke a license upon proof of the bankruptcy or insolvency of any such credit union or upon conviction of a violation of any provision of this act or of any law or regulation of the District of Columbia or of the United States.

POWERS

SEC. 7. A credit union shall have succession in its corporate name during its existence and shall have power—

First. To make contracts.

Second. To sue and be sued in its corporate name.

Third. To adopt and use a common seal and alter the same at pleasure.

Fourth. To purchase, hold, and dispose of property necessary to enable the corporation to carry on its operations.

Fifth. A borrower may prior to maturity repay his loan in whole or in part on any business day.

Sixth. To receive of its members payment on shares.

Seventh. To invest in the paid-up shares of building and loan associations and of other credit unions to an extent not to exceed 25 per cent of its capital, and in any investment legal for savings banks or for trust funds in the District of Columbia.

Eighth. To make deposits in banks and trust companies in the District of Columbia under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Ninth. To borrow in an aggregate outstanding amount not exceeding 40 per cent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital.

Tenth. To fine members for failure to meet promptly their obligations to such corporation.

Eleventh. To impress a lien upon the shares and dividends of any member to the extent of any loan made to him and any dues or fines payable to him.

BY-LAWS

SEC. 8 (a) The incorporators shall subscribe, acknowledge, and submit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia proposed by-laws, and no credit union shall receive payments on account of shares or make any loans until such proposed by-laws have been approved by the commissioners as being in conformity with the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a very controversial bill, one that may affect the Treasury. I was in hopes the committee would call up bills only that were noncontroversial. There are a lot of good bills on the calendar, and this is going to take a long time, and I hope the chairman of the committee will withdraw this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. All right. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms instructed to notify absent Members, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will continue with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BY-LAWS

SEC. 8 (a) The incorporators shall subscribe, acknowledge, and submit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia proposed by-laws, and no credit union shall receive payments on account of shares or make any loans until such proposed by-laws have been approved by the commissioners as being in conformity with the provisions of this act.

(b) The by-laws shall prescribe the purposes for which the corporation is formed, the qualifications for membership, the date of the annual meeting, the manner of conducting meetings, the methods by which members shall be notified of meetings and the number of members which shall constitute a quorum, the number of directors and the compensation and duties of officers, the number of members of the credit committee, the fines, if any, to be charged for failure of members to meet promptly obligations to the corporation, the amount of the entrance fee, if any, to be paid, and such other regulations as are deemed necessary.

(c) Amendments of the by-laws may be adopted by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any members' meeting, but the amendments shall not take effect until approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as being duly adopted and in conformity with the provisions of this act. The meeting shall be duly called for the purpose and the proposed amendments shall be set forth in the call.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Beginning on page 6, line 10, strike out all of section 8.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that ought not to pass. With all due respect to my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], who is an able legislator and a splendid good fellow, he has drawn the bill with but one view in mind, and that is to try to aid some people without thinking about the burden he is placing upon the Government.

We have been told that we lack now, after taxing the people in every way possible, $300,000,000 of balancing the Budget. Yet by this bill you are going to add more burdens to the Government. You are placing upon the Comptroller of the Currency another job, another obligation, requiring him to increase his personnel to supervise these corporations, and putting the taxpayers of the country to more expense. Do you want to do that?

One of the best speeches I ever heard made on this floor was a 5-minute speech made by the great Jim Mann, of Illinois. He said he was never going to vote to incorporate another Federal charter for private business. I heard a similar, splendid speech, made by Uncle Joe Cannon, and another one by the great Martin Madden. They converted me upon that question. I shall never vote to create another Federal charter for private business, and to show you how they appreciate this, to show you how they expect to commercialize it, I read from the last page of the bill, as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, except corporations organized in accordance with this act, to transact business in the District of Columbia under any name or title containing the words "credit union," or to transact business at any place in the United States under any name or title containing the words "credit union" and "District of Columbia" or "Federal" or "United States" or other words indicating that the business is transacted pursuant to authority of any act of Congress.

In other words, you are giving to the corporation created under this special charter the exclusive right to use the word "Federal" and the words "United States" in every part of the United States. Are you willing to do that? Are you going to vote for a bill of that kind? I am not. I am not going to give special privileges to a corporation in the District to the detriment of every individual, business, and corporation in every other part of the United States.

I call attention to another provision in the bill, which provides for supervision by the Comptroller of the Currency. This is a private corporation, organized for special benefit and profit. Its directors can profit by this concern. You are directing and authorizing them to lend money to the Government workers at 12 per cent per annum interest. Talk about loan sharks. They can charge the Government worker 1 per cent a month, and it is all to be supervised by the Comptroller of the Currency. I ask you gentlemen what interest your people at home have in putting this additional burden upon the Comptroller of the Currency and this additional burden on the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. Is there any provision for fees to be paid by these corporations to the Comptroller of the United States or to the United States?

Mr. BLANTON. Fifteen dollars they pay the District of Columbia and that is all and they do not pay the Comptroller of the Currency anything and they do not pay anything to the Government of the United States. There is one man here who knows how much it is going to cost, and that is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He knows that when the Comptroller of the Currency has to supervise corporations of that sort, it costs money, and the first thing the Comptroller of the Currency will do will be to come to our committee and ask us to give him more personnel to do this supervising. I am going to vote not to do it. I am going to be one who is standing by our friend from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, in trying to reduce expenses, and not in trying to increase expenses.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I thought this important enough to make a point of no quorum, and get you here, and not pass a bill of this kind by unanimous consent. Why should we issue a Federal charter to these commercial organizations? If the committee would withdraw this bill they might pass a lot of good bills in the time they will take to pass this one. I know I can not stop the bill, but I am doing my duty by calling your attention to it. If you let this Federal charter be created by your vote, it is not my responsibility. I have done my duty by calling attention to it. I have done my full duty to the country when I have told you what is in this bill, that you are creating another private corporation, many of them, to be supervised by the Comptroller of the Currency, at the expense of the people, giving them an exclusive right, to the detriment of the rest of the people of the United States. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I dislike to differ with my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], but the sole purpose of this bill is to do away with the loan sharks in the District of Columbia and allow Government employees and other residents of the District to borrow money at a reasonable rate.

In the District of Columbia to-day the loan sharks are charging up to 30, 35, and 36 per cent. There are credit unions now in 34 States in the United States. During the depression, when we had 4,000 bank failures in the country, not one single credit union has failed in those 34 States.

This is a poor man's bill. This is a bill which allows people who have confidence in one another to get together and form a credit union. It can be done in the District of Columbia by Government employees and other residents. They buy shares in their own corporation. Then they borrow money when they need it; if they want to borrow $300 or $200 to make a payment on their home, to pay interest, to educate their children, or to start a little home of their own, they may do so; and they are borrowing from their own friends and acquaintances on the faith and credit which those friends and neighbors have in them. That is the sole purpose of this bill.

The provision about coming under the Comptroller of the Currency is along the lines followed in the States. We do not want a credit union that is not regulated by the Government. They are regulated in all the 34 States; the bank examiners go out and examine their books, just as they do the banks, and see to it that the credit union is in a good financial situation. If it is, they are O. K.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Thirty-four States in the Union have these credit unions. Not one of them failed in all of this depression, and it will readily be seen that it is a poor man's proposition.

Mr. Edward A. Filene, a big department store owner in Boston, who is a philanthropist and friend of the people, decided that a sensible, sane way to help his less fortunate neighbors would be to help them help themselves. He has put a great deal of money into helping form these credit unions to develop thrift, to help people save their own money. Many church organizations have these little credit unions all over the country to help the people in their own parishes. The parishes form them. The East Lynn Post of the American Legion in my own home city has a credit union and loans to its own members; it helps them to buy homes and helps them to pay the interest on the mortgage. That is all this bill provides. I say it is a poor man's bill for the Government workers of the District of Columbia and the people of the District of Columbia. It will prevent loan sharks from plundering the poor and unfortunate, and I hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAINEY). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to strike out the section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that was a pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 9. Credit-union membership shall consist of the incorporators and such other persons or organizations as may be elected to membership and subscribe to at least one share, pay the initial installment thereon, and the entrance fee, if any; except that credit-union membership shall be limited to groups the members of which are actual residents of or do business or are employed within the District of Columbia, and either have a common bond of occupation or association or reside within a well-defined neighborhood or community.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

It has been suggested that we should, as in building and loan associations, place a limit on the number of shares that may be held by any one individual in these beneficiary associations. This bill, as I read it, will enable more than one credit union to be formed in the District of Columbia. It is perfectly safeguarded also in that the field of membership is limited to that prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. There is nothing in the provisions of the bill whereby the provisions of this beneficent enactment can be abused. It can only pertain to establishing credit unions in the District of Columbia. However, I think we should place some limit of amount on the number of shares that may be held by any one individual. I would like to know from the gentlewoman from New Jersey or the gentleman from Massachusetts, who, I believe, introduced a companion bill in the House, whether they have any objection to an amendment providing that no more than 200 shares may be held by any one person.

Mr. CONNERY. I would have no objection. That is what we have in Massachusetts.

Mr. STAFFORD. We do that with building and loan associations. We do not want this to be a money-making affair. In every instance called to my attention these credit unions have been successful. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, it is a sincere attempt to stop the loan-shark evil in the District of Columbia. That evil is practiced in the District of Columbia worse than in any other city of like size.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Speaker, and will offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 7, line 15, insert after the word "share," the following: "But not more than 200 shares by any one individual."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the committee will accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEMBERS' MEETINGS

SEC. 10. The fiscal year of all credit unions shall end December 31. The annual meeting of the corporation shall be held at such time during the month of January and at such place as the by-laws shall prescribe. Special meetings may be held in the manner indicated in the by-laws. No member shall be entitled to vote by proxy, but a member other than a natural person may vote through an agent delegated for the purpose. No member shall, irrespective of the number of shares held by him, have more than one vote; and, after a credit union has been incorporated one year, no member thereof shall be entitled to vote until he has been a member for more than three months. All offices of a credit union shall be in the District of Columbia.

MANAGEMENT

SEC. 11. (a) GENERAL.—The business affairs of a credit union shall be managed by a board of not less than five directors, a credit committee of not less than three members, and a supervisory committee of three members, to be elected at the annual meeting, and to hold office for such terms, respectively, as the by-laws may provide and until successors qualify; except that prior to the first annual meeting all the business affairs of a credit union shall be managed by the subscribers to the certificate of incorporation. A record of the names and addresses of the members of the board and committees and the officers shall be filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia within 10 days of their election. No member of the board or of either committee shall, as such, be compensated: Provided, That no person shall be elected to the board or to either committee unless he be duly elected to membership as provided in section 9 of this act.

(b) OFFICERS.—At their first meeting after the annual meeting the directors shall elect from their own number a president, a vice president, a clerk, and a treasurer, who shall be the executive officers of the corporation. The offices of clerk and treasurer may be held by the same person. The duties of the officers shall be as determined in the by-laws, except that the treasurer shall be the general manager of the corporation.

(c) DIRECTORS.—The board of directors shall have the general direction of the affairs of the corporation. They shall act upon application for membership; fix the amount of the surety bond required of any officer having custody of funds; recommend declaration of dividends; determine interest rates on loans: Provided, however, That the interest rate on loans shall not be in excess of the maximum amount fixed by the provisions of this act; fill vacancies in the board and in the credit committee until successors to be elected at the next annual meeting have qualified; have charge of investments other than loans to members; determine the maximum loans other than loans to members; determine the maximum individual share holdings and the maximum individual loan which can be made with and without security, except that no loan in excess of $50 shall be made without adequate security; and transmit to the members recommended amendments to the by-laws. For the purposes of this subdivision an assignment of shares or the indorsement of a note shall be deemed security.

(d) CREDIT COMMITTEE.—The credit committee shall hold meetings, of which due notice shall be given to its members, to consider applications for loans to members of the corporation, and no loan shall be made unless all members of the committee who are present when the application is considered and a majority of all the committee approve the loan. Applications for loans shall be on forms prepared by such committee, which shall set forth the purpose for which the loan is desired, the security, if any, and such other data as may be required.

(e) SUPERVISORY COMMITTEE.—The supervisory committee shall make an examination of the affairs of the credit union at least quarterly, including an audit of its books; shall make an annual audit and report to be submitted at the annual meeting of the corporation; by a unanimous vote may suspend any officer of the corporation, or any member of the credit committee or of the board of directors until the next members' meeting, at which time the suspension shall be acted on by the members; and, by a majority vote, may call a meeting of the shareholders to consider any violation of this subchapter or of the by-laws, or any practice of the corporation deemed by the committee to be unsafe or unauthorized. The said committee shall fill vacancies in its membership until successors to be elected at the next annual meeting have qualified: Provided, however, That before the treasurer shall enter upon his duties he shall give bond with good and sufficient security, in an amount to be determined by the board of directors, conditioned upon the faithful performance of his trust.

RESERVES

SEC. 12. All entrance fees and fines provided by the by-laws and, before the declaration of any dividend therefrom, 20 per centum of the net earnings of each year, shall be set aside as a reserve fund against bad loans, which fund shall be kept liquid and intact and not distributed except in case of liquidation.

DIVIDENDS

SEC. 13. At the annual meeting a dividend may be declared from net earnings on recommendation of the board, which dividend shall be paid on all paid-up shares outstanding at the end of the preceding fiscal year. Shares which become fully paid up during such year shall be entitled to a proportional part of said dividend calculated from the first day of the month following such payment in full.

EXPULSION AND WITHDRAWAL

SEC. 14. A member may be expelled by a two-thirds vote of the members of the corporation present at a special meeting called for such purpose, but only after an opportunity has been given him to be heard. The credit union may require 60 days' notice of intention to withdraw shares. Expulsion or withdrawal shall not operate to relieve a member from any remaining liability to the credit union. All amounts paid in on shares or deposited by expelled or withdrawing members prior to their expulsion or withdrawal shall be paid to them in the order of their withdrawal or expulsion, but only as funds become available and after deducting any amounts due from such members to the credit union.

MINORS

SEC. 15. Shares may be issued and deposits received in the name of a minor or in trust in such manner as the by-laws may provide. The name of the beneficiary shall be disclosed to the credit union.

TAXATION

SEC. 16. Credit unions, but not the members thereof, shall be exempt from Federal and District of Columbia taxation except taxes upon real property.

RESTRICTION ON USE OF WORDS "CREDIT UNION"

SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful for any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, except corporations organized in accordance with this act, to transact business in the District under any name or title containing the words "credit union," or to transact business at any place in the United States under any name or title containing the words "credit union" and "District of Columbia" or "Federal" or "United States" or other words indicating that the business is transacted pursuant to authority of any act of Congress. Any individual, partnership, association, or corporation violating this section shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine not in excess of $100 for each day during which the violation continues.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 13, line 3, after the word "union," strike out the remainder of line 3, all of lines 4 and 5, and up to and including the word "States," in line 6.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If we strike out the language suggested by the gentleman from Texas it would do exactly what he seeks to avoid.

If we strike out this language it would then be permissible for a corporation not organized, not under supervision, to use the words "credit union" or "Federal" or "United States."

The purpose of this is to limit the use of the words "credit union" to only such organizations as are organized in accordance with the provisions of this act and under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Now, if you do not do that, organizations not under such control, not under such limitations, loan sharks would be able to use the words "credit union" and take advantage of the name without any of its responsibility.

Now, as to use of the words "United States" and "Federal" in connection with an organization—the name must first be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency—and I am sure the Comptroller of the Currency is not going to permit any group to call itself "United States Credit Union." But if it is "the Savings Credit Union, organized under Federal law," or "organized under the law of the United States," it must be so organized. Otherwise, it may not use that designation.

So, although the gentleman from Texas is a very careful legislator, in this instance, I believe, his theory will not be carried out if the words are stricken from the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The present law keeps them from using those names.

Mr. STAFFORD. They should not.

Mr. TABER. They should not; that is right.

Mr. BLANTON. People elsewhere should have equal rights. What has the District of Columbia Credit Union got to do with the rest of the United States? Why should there be a provision in the bill that no other company could use the words "credit union" in connection with the words "Federal" or "United States" without being guilty of an offense and subject to a fine of $100?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is quite aware that many corporations use the word "National" or "Federal" to give the public the impression that they have some connection with the Federal Government or are incorporated by act of Congress. They should not be privileged to use those names.

The purpose of the amendment is to meet that evil.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows if we carry the language contained in the bill, there may be 500 different corporations incorporate under this act, and every one of them have a Federal charter, but they are all here in the District of Columbia. Because they are incorporated under this act they can use the word "Federal" or the words "United States" or the words "credit union" in connection with those two words, but none of the others anywhere else may do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. But they have to be subject to the examination of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. BLANTON. In what way are the rest of the people of the United States interested in them? In no way.

Mr. TABER. And, if the gentleman will yield, they must have permission to file their certificate of incorporation.

Mr. BLANTON. They get that from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and from nobody else.

Mr. TABER. Certainly; that is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me say, also, that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are concerned with an area only 10 miles square, and not with 48 States of the Union.

I have done my duty by calling the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that unless this language is stricken out, if there is a credit union in every town in every Member's district, where it is called "credit union," it can not operate hereafter without some question being raised under this law and without being guilty of an offense, and being subject to a fine of $100 a day for every day it operates under the name of "credit union." Do the Members want that provision to remain in the bill? Hereafter, no company or organization will be permitted to have the word "Federal" connected with it, without being guilty of an offense and paying $100 a day.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TABER. That is, provided they use the words "credit union" and "District of Columbia" together?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. TABER. Or use the words "credit union" and "Federal" together, or "credit union" and "United States" together.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no.

Mr. TABER. That is what it states.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill states "or 'Federal' or 'United States.'"

Mr. TABER. Certainly the bill does, but the organization has to use the words "credit union" and one of those three words in order to constitute a violation. That is what the language of the bill states.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose the name of an organization contains the words "credit union" and the word "Federal."

Mr. TABER. It should not unless the organization has a permit from Congress. We can amend this if we have to, or if there is any occasion for it.

Mr. BLANTON. There could be no credit unions anywhere in the United States calling themselves Federal credit unions, after we pass this bill, except here in Washington, D. C.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no law on credit unions at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. The present law prohibits a corporation from using as part of its name the word "Federal" or "United States."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The biggest crash we had in New York City was that of the United States Bank, and it took over 48 hours to make the people of Europe understand that it was not the bank of the United States Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Can the gentleman tell us just what effect the law would have on States in that respect, either with their doing business or using names?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have that matter now before the Committee on the Judiciary.

I may say that in New York State we have credit unions, and the use of the name "credit union" is limited to such organizations as are under supervision. The words "savings bank" can not be used in the same sense. The words "national bank" can not be used. So, the language here limiting the use to such organizations as are organized and under supervision is carrying out similar language of other measures on the same subject.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. TABER. On page 2, lines 2 and 3, the operations of this corporation are absolutely limited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And unless we have this language a fake company could advertise all over the country and hold itself out as being under this supervision and organized under authority of this act. This measure is for the very protection which I am sure the gentleman from Texas has in mind.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of the amendment in order to get some information. I would like to ask some member of the committee whether this corporation is going to be permitted to use the words "United States or Federal Credit Union," under the terms of section 17.

Mr. BLANTON. It could do it under this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It seems to me that under the section 17, as worded, the corporation could use the name, "United States Credit Union."

Mr. CONNERY. They could not do that without the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency. They would have to have the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency to do that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Suppose he approved it? We should prevent it and not leave it to the discretion of a Government official.

Mr. CONNERY. He would not approve it.

Mr. BLANTON. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Massachusetts will recall that we had a bank or trust company called the United States Bank or Trust Co., I do not remember which, in the District of Columbia. I had a small deposit in the United States Bank or Trust Co., and one day there was a run on this institution of the District of Columbia. There were several thousand people outside the bank, many having Christmas savings accounts. It so happened that the Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, in some way arranged for the Munsey Trust Co. to take over that institution and nobody lost any money. But it went out all over the United States that the United States Bank or Trust Co., in Washington, D. C., had closed its doors, and you can imagine the effect that had upon the people of this country. A statement to the effect that the United States Bank or Trust Co., of Washington, D. C., had closed its doors did not sound good to depositors, many not aware the Government had no connection with its management. There was a nation-wide demand to prohibit the use of the words "United States" in connection with any kind of a financial institution. I am in favor of this bill, but I am not in favor of it if this corporation can use the words "United States."

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think the gentleman need have any fear about that because, first of all, it comes under the Comptroller of the Currency, who will have the say on that; and, secondly, because no credit union in the United States has failed during all this depression.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, the language expressly provides that it shall be unlawful for anybody else to do it except corporations incorporated under this act. It permits them, by express authorization, to use the words "United States."

Mr. CONNERY. But it comes under the Comptroller of the Currency, and the gentleman need have no bother about that. It will not be the United States Credit Union, but it will be the Department of Commerce Credit Union or the Bureau of Printing and Engraving Credit Union, like it is in other places.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, it is not the Comptroller of the Currency who has anything to do with the name. It is the District Commissioners. When they file their certificates with the District Commissioners they are the ones who pass upon it and not the Comptroller of the Currency. He has nothing to do with the name.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; if I still have the floor. Others are using all my time and, I might add, without my permission.

Mr. PALMISANO. I might state that if the comptroller happens to permit the use of the name "United States," under section 18 this Congress can change any name or any charter or certificate of incorporation. The Congress would have the right to do that in the event he would permit it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman [Mr. PALMISANO], who was the chairman of the subcommittee that handled the bill, what objection he would have to striking out the words, starting in line 5, that would permit the use of the words "United States" or "Federal"?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I was going to propose such an amendment. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What right, if I may be permitted to ask, has the gentleman from New York to take me off the floor?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I was going to offer such an amendment, but I yield to my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] for that purpose. I am pleased to note the gentleman takes the same view as I do, and I hope the distinguished lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], who so ably handles the District of Columbia Committee, will give her approval, for I am confident it will mean its adoption and will remove a most objectionable feature of the bill as well as hasten its passage.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. In line 5, beginning with the word "or," strike out the word "or" and the words in line 6 ending with "United States."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I accept that amendment and ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: On page 13, beginning in line 5, with the word "or," strike out the language "or 'Federal' or 'United States.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act or any part thereof, or any charter or certificate of incorporation issued pursuant to the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 429. Joint resolution to amend section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1155. An act to establish a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes; and

S. 3400. An act to amend an act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8754. An act to control the possession, sale, transfer, and use of pistols and other dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia, to provide penalties, to prescribe rules of evidence, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11361) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. NYE, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. KENDRICK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LICENSE FEES

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11638) to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to objest, before the bill is considered in the House, I would like the author of the bill to make a short statement as to the reasons for it. Is this the bill that was passed in the last Congress?

Mr. GILBERT. No; this is a bill that provides for a new license law for the District of Columbia. The present license law is 30 years old, and a great many businesses have sprung up in that time.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman the author of the bill?

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is the author of the bill. I am chairman of the subcommittee that held hearings on the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give some reason why the theater tax should be reduced from $100 to $50 as proposed and the motion-picture-theater tax reduced to $30? Some of these recommendations are rather appealing, while others seem to be not so favorable to the taxpayers of the District.

Mr. GILBERT. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that no Member of Congress can possibly know the relative merits of all these propositions, with respect to the city of Washington. These were worked out by a committee that worked for six months or more. The committee was composed of the superintendent of licenses, Mr. Wade H. Coombs, an assistant of the corporation counsel's office, and a former corporation counsel. It was based, in the main, upon the inspection required and the expense of controlling these businesses. After they made this recommendation and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] introduced the bill, I held hearings on it.

I will frankly admit I am not qualified to pass on the relative amounts that should be paid by all these numerous businesses, but I gave notice to everybody affected by this proposed license bill that if they had any objection to it we would hold hearings. Quite a few gathered and we heard complaints. If there is any complaint about this particular item, none was made, and the parties had knowledge of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. They would not make any objection to a reduction of the fee, of course. I am raising the question whether it is fair to the taxpayers of the District to have these fees reduced.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. With reference particularly to theater inspection and the theater license, there was a time when they had to make numerous inspections. These inspections have now been reduced to practically four a year, whereas they formerly had to make 10 or 12 or 14. These amounts are based on actual inspections, the time required to make the inspections, and also takes into consideration the number of inspections per year in reference to all the various items recommended in the bill.

Mr. GILBERT. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall not delay consideration of the bill any further. It is quite a lengthy bill and I have gone over it somewhat carefully. Although there are some items I did not think were quite equitable, I withdraw any objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewomen from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"PAR. 3. Any license issued by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their designated agent to the proprietor of a theater or other public place of amusement may be terminated by the commissioners whenever it shall appear to them that after due notice the person holding such license shall have failed to comply with such regulations as may be prescribed by the commissioners for the public decency.

"PAR. 32. The owners or managers of establishments where automobiles or other motor vehicles are kept for rent or lease without a driver shall pay a license fee of $5 per annum for each such establishment: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be so construed as to exempt such owners or managers from paying additional license taxes required by this section.

Any person desiring a solicitor's license shall make application to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their designated agent on forms to be provided for that purpose, stating the name of the applicant, the name and address of the person whom he represents, the class and kind of goods offered for sale or the kind of service to be performed. "PAR. 41. Dealers in dangerous or deadly weapons shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum. "BOND

"PAR. 43b. No license shall become effective hereunder until bond in due form in the penal sum of $1,000, with two or more sureties or duly authorized surety company to be approved by the commissioners, shall have been deposited with the commissioners. The bond shall be payable to the District of Columbia and shall be conditioned that the person applying for the license will comply with this act and shall pay all damages occasioned to any person by reason of any misstatement, misrepresentation, fraud, or deceit, or any unlawful act or omission of any licensed person, made, committed, or omitted in the business conducted under such license, or caused by any other violation of this act in carrying on the business for which such license is granted. One or more recoveries upon such bond shall not vitiate the same, but it shall remain in full force and effect: Provided, however, That the aggregate amount of all such recoveries shall not exceed the full amount of the bond. Upon the commencement of any action or actions against the surety upon any such bond for a sum or sums aggregating or exceeding the amount of such bond the commissioners may require a new and additional bond in like amount as the original one, which shall be filed with the commissioners within 30 days of the demand therefor. Failure to file such bond within the prescribed time shall constitute cause for the revocation of the license therefor issued. Any suit or action against the surety on any bond required by the provisions of this section shall be commenced within one year from the accruing of the cause of action thereon.

"If at any time, in the opinion of the commissioners, the sureties, or any of them, shall become irresponsible, the person holding such license shall, upon notice from the commissioners, give a new bond, and the failure to give a new bond within 10 days after such notice, in the discretion of the commissioners, shall operate as a revocation of such license.

"The commissioners shall furnish to anyone applying therefor a certified copy of any such bond filed in their office upon the payment of a fee of $1, and such certified copy shall be prima facie evidence in any court that such bond was duly executed and delivered by the person or corporation whose name appears therein.

"REGISTERS

"PAR. 43c. It shall be the duty of every licensee to keep a register, approved by the commissioners, in which shall be entered, in the English language, the date of the application for employment, the name and address of the applicant to whom employment is promised or offered, the amount of the fee received, and, whenever possible, the names and addresses of former employers or persons to whom such applicant is known. Such licensee shall also enter in a separate register, approved by the commissioners, in the English language, the name and address of every applicant accepted for help, the date of such application, kind of help requested, the names of the persons sent, with the designation of the one employed, and the amount of the fee received. The aforesaid registers of applicants for employment and help shall be open during office hours to inspection by the said commissioners. No such licensee shall make any false entry in such registers. It shall be the duty of every licensee, whenever possible, to communicate orally or in writing with at least one of the persons mentioned as references for every applicant for work in private families or employed in a fiduciary capacity, and the result of such investigation shall be kept on file in such agency: Provided, That if the applicant for help voluntarily waives in writing such investigation of references by the licensee, failure on the part of the licensee to make such investigation shall not be deemed a violation of this section.

"RECEIPTS

"PAR 43d. It shall be the duty of such licensee to give to every applicant for employment from whom a fee shall be received a receipt in which shall be stated the name of said applicant, the date and amount of the fee, and the purpose for which it was paid, and to every applicant for help a receipt stating the name and address of said applicant, the date and amount of the fee, and the kind of help to be provided. Every receipt given by such licensee shall bear the name and address of such licensee printed in large type thereon. Every receipt shall have printed on the back thereof a copy of section 4 of the act in the English language.

No private employment agency licensed hereunder shall be located in rooms used for living purposes, or in rooms where boarders or lodgers are kept, or where meals are served or persons sleep, or in any building or on premises wherein rooms are located and used for living purposes, or wherein boarders or lodgers are kept, or where meals are served, or persons sleep, or in any building wherein such rooms are located; nor shall any such private employment agency be located in any such building where the entrance thereto is not separate and apart from the entrance to the building proper, or where there is any entrance into the building proper from said private employment agency: Provided, That no one shall be precluded from keeping an employment agency in an office building by reason of there being a café or restaurant in another part of said building.

"APPLICATION OF MINOR

"PAR. 43f. No licensee shall accept any application for employment made by or on behalf of any child, or shall place or assist in placing any such child in any employment whatever in violation of any compulsory education or child labor laws.

"INSPECTION

All registers, books, records, and other papers required to be kept pursuant to this article in any private employment agency shall be open at all reasonable hours to the inspection of the commissioners, and every licensee shall post in a conspicuous place in such agency the license certificate.

"FALSE INFORMATION

"PAR. 43h. No licensee conducting any private employment agency shall publish or cause to be published any false or fraudulent or misleading information, representation, notice, or advertisement, nor shall he give any false information, or make any false promise or false representation concerning an engagement or employment to any applicant who shall register or apply for an engagement or employment or help.

"EXCEPTIONS

Mediums, clairvoyants, soothsayers, fortune tellers, palmists, or phrenologists, by whatsoever name called, conducting business for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, shall pay a license tax of $250 per annum. No license shall be issued hereunder without the approval of the major and superintendent of police, nor shall any license be issued hereunder to any person not an actual resident of the District of Columbia for two years next preceding his date of application: Provided, That no license shall be required of persons pretending to tell fortunes or practice palmistry, phrenology, or any of the callings herein listed, in a regular licensed theater, or as a part of any play, exhibition, fair, or show presented or offered in aid of any benevolent, charitable, or educational purpose.

"PAR. 45. No person shall set up, operate, or conduct any business or device by or in which any person, animal, or living object shall act or be exposed as a target for any ball, projectile, missile, or thing thrown or projected for or in consideration of profit or gain, directly or indirectly.

"PAR. 46. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered, when in their discretion such is deemed advisable, to require a license of other businesses or callings not listed herein and which, in their judgment, require inspection, supervision, or regulation by any municipal agency or agencies and to fix the license fee therefor in such amount as, in their judgment, will be commensurate with the cost to the District of Columbia of such inspection, supervision, or regulation, and are further authorized and empowered in their discretion to modify any of the provisions of this section so far as eliminating therefrom any business or calling herein required to be licensed, or to raise or lower the amount of the license fee provided herein, as the cost of inspection, supervision, or regulation is raised or lowered.

"PAR. 47. The commissioners are further authorized and empowered to make any regulations that may be necessary in furtherance of the purpose of this section and to revoke any license issued hereunder when, in their judgment, such is deemed desirable in the interest of public decency or the protection of lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of the citizens of the District of Columbia, or for any other reason they may deem sufficient.

"PAR. 48. Prosecutions for violations of any of the provisions of this section, or of any paragraph added hereto from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or of any regulation made by the commissioners under authority of this section, shall be on information in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants.

"PAR. 50. Any violation of any provision of law or regulation issued hereunder which is repealed by this section and any liability arising under such provisions or regualtions may, if the violation occurred or the liability arose prior to such repeal, be prosecuted to the same extent as if this section had not been enacted.

"PAR. 51. If any provision of this section is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the section and the applicability of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"PAR. 52. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to refund any license fee or tax, or portion thereof, erroneously paid or collected under this section."

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

On page 8, line 6, strike out "$125" and insert "$65."

On page 12, lines 22 and 23, strike out all of paragraph 25 and insert:

"PAR. 25. Proprietors or owners of any circus transported by railroad into the District of Columbia shall pay a license tax of $3 per day for each carload of circus equipment, and proprietors or owners of any circus transported by wagons or motor trucks into the District of Columbia shall pay a license tax of $2 per day for each motor-truck load or wagonload of circus equipment, but not to exceed $250 per day."

On page 15, line 14, insert after the comma following the word "association" the word "trust."

On page 20, line 16, strike out "37" and insert "36."

On page 21, line 20, strike out "38" and insert "37."

On page 23, line 3, strike out "39" and insert "38."

On page 23, line 6, strike out "$5" and insert "$10."

On page 23, line 10, insert after the word "for" the words "the examination of all applicants for such licenses and for."

On page 23, line 14, strike out "40" and insert "39."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 23, line 14, after the word "property," insert the following:

"Including the return or other unused portion of any ticket, order, or token purporting to evidence the right of the holder or possessor thereof to be transported by any railroad or other common carrier, however operated, from one State or Territory of the United States or from the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or to the District of Columbia."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition in opposition to this committee amendment.

Is the language in the amendment now under consideration to be considered as recognizing the old practice of ticket scalpers purchasing the unused portion of railroad tickets? The language of the bill would be, "dealers in second-hand personal property, including the return or other unused portion of any ticket, order, or token purporting to evidence the right of the holder or possessor thereof to be transported by any railroad or other common carrier, however operated, from one State or Territory of the United States, or from the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States or to the District of Columbia."

I take it this language is broad enough to recognize the practice that has been banned by all legislatures of forbidding the practice of selling the unused portion of railroad tickets.

Mr. GILBERT. It recognizes that this is being done; and where it is being done, there is a license put upon it. Of course we can not by this legislation validify an invalid contract. This would not force the railroads to accept anything of this kind, but it would put a tax on such operations.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there is one policy that has been recognized as good, sound business in railway and other character of transportation, it is that brokers or other individuals should not be permitted to traffic in the unused portions of carrier transportation.

I remember, as older Members remember, that 40 or 50 years ago the prevailing practice was to sell the unused portion of round-trip tickets. Now the practice is for persons who do not use the whole ticket to send the unused portion to the railroad company and receive a refund, less the 1-fare rate.

I do not think the House should adopt this amendment—even squint at recognizing the old policy that has been condemned for many years.

If the committee will permit a personal reference, it was my privilege back in the eighties to hear a lecture by the first chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Thomas M. Cooley, a professor of law in the University of Michigan, deprecating the practice of selling the unused portion of a railroad ticket. I recall in the early days in Chicago, and in my own city, there were ticket scalpers indulging in that practice. I think the amendment should be rejected for the reasons I have given.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin and the House that, as will appear in the hearings on this bill, this amendment was put in at the request of the carriers themselves. The railroads themselves asked that this amendment be inserted. It was their contention, and I suppose a sound one, that licensing this practice, or at least putting a license fee upon it, would not compel them to change their outlawry of the practice but simply recognize that as the evil exists it could be better handled that way. Personally, I have no opinion about the matter, but I wanted to inform the gentleman that the amendment was inserted at the request of the railroad people.

Mr. HARLAN. Is it not true that this provision of law adds a condition or penalty for violation of the law which would take a complicated prosecution to convict? This is simply an enabling arm given to the law to get at these people who are now doing an illegal business.

Mr. GILBERT. That is the purpose of the amendment, to help abolish the practice which the gentleman complains of.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this law gives the railroad companies a chance properly to check up every firm and individual engaged in this scalping business. Without this provision there could be many persons who would engage in the business without any check-up on them at all.

While I have the floor I want to say that in the District of Columbia barbers are the only persons who have to work seven days every week.

A MEMBER. Besides Congressmen.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, besides ourselves; but I am talking about citizens here. There is no other class of citizens left in Washington D. C. who have to work seven days a week.

The reason the bill was drawn in the way it is was to meet the objections of the Seventh Day Adventists and other organizations that consider some other day besides Sunday the Sabbath. They wanted to fix it so as to get around their objections.

There is not another city in the United States where barbers have to work Sunday.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I want it to provide that they shall not work on Sunday.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will withdraw his objection and let the bill go through, they will not have to work on the Sabbath.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It worked out that way in New York.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not get any other kind of a bill through here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not?

Mr. BLANTON. You can not get it out of the committee. We have been trying to close barber shops here on Sunday for many years, but the Seventh-day Adventists and these other organizations that are against the observance of the Sabbath, or setting aside Sunday, they will come in and fight you every time, and you will never get that kind of a bill through. You are going to keep the barbers working seven days a week.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there are only a few scab shops that work on Sunday.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; they are working all over this city right now on Sunday, and they work seven days a week, and the gentleman by his objection is making these men work seven days a week in the city of Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not. I want them to be given the Sabbath day. I have no objection to the House bill forbidding barbering on the Sabbath.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, let us have the bill before the House for a vote anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have a very important amendment here under consideration which has no relevancy to the Sabbath at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the remaining committee amendments.

The following committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Page 24, line 7, after the word "description," insert "including the return or unused portion of any such ticket, order, or token."

Page 31, line 24, strike out the word and figure "Section 4" and insert "paragraph 42h."

Page 34, line 10, after the word "purpose," insert a colon and the following:

"And provided further, That no license shall be required of any ordained priest or minister or accredited representative of any such priest or minister the fees for whose ministrations are not the private property of such ordained priest, minister, or accredited representative of such priest or minister."

Page 36, line 7, after the word "days," insert a new sentence, as follows:

"Any person failing to file any information required by this section, or by any regulation of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia made under the provisions hereof, or who in filing any such information makes any false or misleading statement, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $300 or imprisoned for not more than 90 days."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I invite the attention of the gentleman reporting the bill to the provision in paragraph 42b, prescribing the amount of the bond of all these persons to be licensed in the sum of $1,000. The bill as I read it grants to the commissioners the right to change the fees whenever they determine conditions warrant a change. Does not the gentleman think that this is a heavy penalty for an apothecary, who is obliged to pay only a small tax, or a beauty-parlor operator, or some of these minor licensees? Is not $1,000 a rather heavy bond? If that is the opinion of the gentleman, I am wondering, in view of the broad powers vested in the commissioners, whether they should not have the right to lower the amount of the bond that shall be given so as to enable them to determine the size of the bond below $1,000 in the case of these minor businesses, businesses like hand laundries and dry-cleaning establishments?

Mr. GILBERT. I agree with the gentleman. I think it is a little too high.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman and other members of the committee have any objection to inserting, after the sum "$1,000," in line 20, page 28, the words "or such lesser amount as the commissioners may determine"?

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 20, after the figures "$1,000," insert "or such lesser amount as the commissioners may determine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: Page 17, line 20, before the word "and," insert "subject, however, to use for parking of automobiles engaged in official use."

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there is another bill pending (S. 4123) which refers to the District of Columbia traffic act and seeks to amend it, and refers to all places in the city for the purpose of parking automobiles for official use of Representatives and Senators only on official business. If this bill should become a law, it would in effect be repealing the 1931 statute in so far as the power of the director of vehicles of the District of Columbia is involved. I say that with due respect to those who have prepared this bill, and from personal experience with police department officials in the city of Washington. The attitude of the Washington police is that they have absolute control of the curbs. Their attitude is that they entirely disregard this metal tag or the tag mentioned in the 1931 law. Their attitude is that instead of having a metal tag they will require Representatives and Senators to carry paper tags or cards. All of this is covered by correspondence I had with the department concerning difficulties different Representatives have been in with the police department here, and I beg of you to put in a provision right here that they can not so handle their traffic rules in the city of Washington so that policemen and sergeants and captains can say "Notwithstanding what you have passed in Congress, you can not park in this taxi stand; you can not park in this vicinity right here."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. There is nothing in this bill that affects in any way the present rights of Members of Congress, both the House and Senate, to park their cars when on official duty, and the District Commissioners will not interfere with that right. They understand that that right is inviolate, and they are not going to try to interfere with it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The correspondence I have here indicates that they do not understand it is inviolate.

Mr. BLANTON. They will not bother the gentleman's car unless he allows them to. If he does not allow them to do it, they will not do it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have not allowed them to do it, but I have had difficulties myself, and I have had to listen to the difficulties of other Members of Congress. I think the proper thing for the Congress to do is to state in unmistakable language that within the powers of the director of vehicles and traffic he shall not designate taxi stands or other restricted districts in the city, so that the cars of Senators and Representatives shall be prohibited from parking in those districts while on official business. The language which I have submitted by this amendment I think covers the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman propose to allow cars of a privileged class to preempt the space that should be allotted to cars for the public? Shall Representatives and Senators attending theaters preempt this space?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Oh, no; only on official use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the cars of Senators and Representatives are always on official use.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin is like myself—he never goes to the theater.

Mr. STAFFORD. I go to the theaters, but I do not use an automobile like the gentleman from Texas does. I observe and see things which the gentleman does not. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Within the last 24 hours and within 800 feet of where I sit there is a tag marked "taxi stand" over by the House Office Building, and I had the experience of being ordered out of that place by a taxi driver. His words were peremptory. It is true I did not move my car from there and it is true I was on official business, but there should not be any incentive in the law or regulations made thereunder to the director of vehicles of this city or to a taxi driver to interfere with a Member when he is on official business. I suggest this is the place in the statute where the director of vehicles will get his instructions from Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. It is just such observations that are made once in a while by the gentleman and by the gentleman from Wisconsin that cause this trouble. As far as the law is concerned, it is mandatory right now on the District officials not to interfere with official cars on official business and they will not interfere unless there is something placed in the RECORD that make them believe they have that right. Notwithstanding what the gentleman has said, I maintain they do not have any such right under the present law, and they will not bother the gentleman's car unless he allows them to do it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The present law is as the gentleman from Texas says. We are about to enact another law which supersedes it. It gives the director of vehicles greater powers or new powers, or restates his powers, and he will not pay any attention to the present-existing law after this bill becomes law. I am attempting to make this clear so as to show here what is the law regarding the use of parking automobiles when on official duty. The proposed amendment recognizes existing law and there will be no dispute if the suggested amendment is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not necessary, and the issue is beclouded by attempting to put something in here, because they will not bother the gentleman in any event.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Sergeant at Arms or the Doorkeeper or somebody sent me tags, but he did not send an automobile with them. What about that? [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON of Colorado. They gave the gentleman a paper tag instead of a metal tag. That is all he gets.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The law permits Congressmen and Senators and certain officials to have this privilege before public buildings and it should not be extended to that space not before public buildings, before hotels and places of that kind, especially set aside for taxicabs. A Congressman has no business, in my opinion, running his car in on a limited space before a hotel, which is set aside for a taxicab, any more than anyone else.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GILBERT. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Let me direct the gentleman's attention to the corner of Fourteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue. On Fourteenth Street is the Department of Public Roads. Has the gentleman ever gone to that department to attend to any business?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes; I have been there.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Where did the gentleman park his automobile?

Mr. GILBERT. I do not remember now.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The gentleman probably hired a taxicab instead of taking his own automobile, but the only place to park is in the taxicab space, and there are other offices of this Government in places just like that. I am trying to take care of that situation. Did the gentleman ever attempt to go to the Department of Justice and find a place to park? The only parking space there and at the Veterans' Administration is in a space reserved for taxicabs, and that is all.

Mr. GILBERT. In the opinion of the committee it would be unwise to take away from the commissioners the right to regulate and set aside taxicab stands or to limit their full control over them. Otherwise there will be confusion in the general traffic situation, and there will be embarrassment by taxicab drivers, so that they can not be controlled, because they will say that Members of Congress are parking their cars there and so on.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill does not in any way interfere with the right of Members parking their cars on official business and does not interfere with the present law at all.

Mr. GILBERT. No; the present law is not interfered with at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EATON of Colorado), there were—ayes 2, and noes 15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9557) to amend certain sections of the code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, relating to descent and distribution.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House passed this bill by practically unanimous consent in the last Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered, read, engrossed, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the House Calendar. The bill should be read. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 380 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 29, sec. 288), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 380. If there be no child or descendant, the whole shall go to the father and mother in equal shares, or to the survivor of them."

SEC. 2. Section 384 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 29, sec. 292), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 384. If there be no collaterals, the grandfathers and grandmothers, or such of them as survive, shall take alike."

SEC. 3. Section 940 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 231), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 940. Course of descents generally: On the death of any person seized of an estate in fee simple in lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the District of Columbia, and intestate thereof, the same shall descend in fee simple to such person's kindred in the following order, namely:

"First. To his child or children and their descendants.

"Second. If there be no child or descendant of a child, then equally to the father and mother of the intestate, or the whole to the sole surviving parent.

"Third. If there be no father or mother, then to the brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants.

"Fourth. If there be no brother or sister or descendant from a brother or sister, then the whole shall go to the widow or widower of the intestate.

"Fifth. If none such, then one moiety of the estate shall go to the paternal, the other to the maternal, kindred of the intestate in the following order:

"Sixth. First to the grandfather and grandmother equally, but if one be dead the entire moiety to the sole surviving grandparent.

"Seventh. If none, then to the uncles and aunts of the intestate, and their descendants.

"Eighth. If none such, then to the great grandfathers and great grandmothers, in the same manner prescribed for grandfather and grandmother in subdivision 6.

"Ninth. If none, then to the brothers and sisters of the grandfathers and grandmothers, and their descendants.

"Tenth. And so on in other cases, without end, passing to the nearest lineal ancestors and the descendants of such ancestors.

"Eleventh. If there be no paternal kindred, the whole shall go to the maternal kindred; and if there be no maternal kindred, the whole shall go to the paternal kindred. If there be neither maternal nor paternal kindred, the whole shall go to the kindred of the husband or wife of the intestate in the like course as if such husband or wife had died entitled to the estate; and if the intestate has had more husbands or wives than one, and all have died before such intestate, then the estate shall be equally divided among the kindred of the several husbands or wives in equal degree equally."

SEC. 4. Section 941 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 232), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 941. When a person dies intestate and without issue, having real estate of inheritance, the gift of either of his parents, such parent, if living, shall inherit the whole of such estate."

SEC. 5. Section 942 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 233), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 942. If an infant dies without issue, having the title to real estate derived by gift, devise, or descent from one of his parents, the whole shall descend to that parent and his or her kindred as hereinbefore directed, if there is any; and if none, then in like manner to the other parent and his or her kindred; but the kindred of one shall not be so excluded by the kindred of the other parent, if the latter is more remote than the grandfather, grandmother, uncles, and aunts of the intestate and their descendants."

SEC. 6. Sections 943 to 951, inclusive, of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, secs. 234 to 242, inclusive), are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. Section 954 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 245), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 954. Collaterals of the half blood shall inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood, or as ascending kindred, when they take with either."

SEC. 8. Section 955 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 246), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 955. Whenever those entitled to share in the estate in fee simple in lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the District of Columbia, of an intestate, are all in the same degree of kindred to the intestate, they shall take per capita or by persons; and, where a part of them are dead and a part living, the issue of those dead shall take per stirpes or by stocks the shares of their deceased parents."

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not think a bill of this importance should be passed without a few words of explanation.

The law of descent and distribution in the District of Columbia is copied after the old Maryland Code of 1786. This House has frequently attempted to correct the inequalities growing out of that old system of distribution. As pointed out by Mr. BLANTON, the House has before passed this bill, but for some reason it has never become a law, and in the District of Columbia preference in distribution is still given to females over males.

Did you know that in this enlightened country, and in its Capital, the father inherits to the exclusion of the mother? A few years ago a young man was killed by the street cars. His estate received a verdict of some considerable amount of money. The father and mother had been separated for years and the husband had abandoned the wife and the children. The wife was compelled to rear and educate the children. When the boy was killed and a verdict rendered to his estate, the father had the nerve and audacity to come into the courts and take the whole of that estate and was permitted to do so under the laws of the District.

Under the present laws of the District of Columbia brothers and sisters inherit before fathers and mothers. It is the opinion of lawmakers almost everywhere, I take it, that mothers and fathers should inherit in preference to brothers and sisters, because brothers and sisters will eventually get it anyhow, and fathers and mothers perhaps past the years of productivity are in more need as a rule than brothers and sisters.

While I will not attempt to annoy the House by going into these details, this is an effort on my part, after many years of work in examining the laws of many States, to bring the law of descent and distribution of the District of Columbia up to what humanity considers modern standards.

Of course, a lawyer recognizes the delicacy of legislation of this kind, and I want to assure the House that there is nothing in the bill that is original on my part. It is simply a copy of the laws of my own State which I found, after examining the laws of 42 States in the Union, to be a splendid composite of the present thought on matters of descent and distribution. I have not invaded any new field; and there will be no questions arising under this law that have not been settled by the courts time and time again. This law has been in operation in my State for more than 75 years and has given splendid satisfaction.

I felt this explanation was due the House. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the only other bill to be taken up is the traffic bill. I withdraw the point of no quorum temporarily.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4123, to amend the District of Columbia traffic acts, as amended, and ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentlewoman from New Jersey will withdraw this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas withhold the point for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, before any further steps are taken, I desire to make a brief announcement. Under the special order for to-morrow we will have under consideration the bonus bill. Four hours of general debate are provided and it is probable a number of amendments will be offered. It is considered imperative, in view of our legislative program, to finish that bill before we adjourn to-morrow night, and it shall be the purpose of the management on this side to try to hold the House in session until the final disposition of that bill. I make this announcement in order that Members may make their arrangements accordingly. We meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow in accordance with the unanimous-consent request made earlier in the day.

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is with genuine sorrow that I announce the demise of William C. Redfield, former Member of this House and Secretary of Commerce in the Wilson Cabinet.

He has gone through the valley of the shadow to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns.

Death found him a shining mark, cynosure of all eyes, honored and revered throughout the country as a conscientious public servant of fine attainments and rare ability. A rugged honesty weaved its way through all his words and deeds.

Orator, author, banker, manufacturer, statesman, he achieved distinction in many fields of endeavor. He has indeed left his "footprints on the sands of time." He was recipient of tokens and tributes of respect and distinction at home and abroad.

A kindly gentleman of broadest charity, in the words of Micah, he "loved mercy, did justice, and walked humbly before his God."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous request, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CLAGUE, for two days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker pro tempore:

H. J. Res. 429. Joint resolution to amend section 625 (a) of the revenue act of 1932.

SENATE ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution extending for one year the time within which the American claimants may make application for payment, under the settlement of war claims act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and of the Tripartite Claims Commission.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11337. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the Federal building site in Dover, N. J., for another site.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

PUBLIC WORKS AND UNEMPLOYMENT-RELIEF LEGISLATION

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the biggest and most important issue in the United States to-day is that of unemployment. There are over 8,000,000 of American wage earners who are unemployed, millions more on part time, and many millions who have had their wages reduced from 10 to 50 per cent. The Congress of the United States, both Republicans and Democrats, have been deaf, dumb, and blind to the unemployment situation and have done practically nothing to relieve human misery which stalks throughout the Nation. All that Congress has done up to date has been to donate 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to partially relieve hunger and undernourishment.

The American wage earners are not asking for charity or doles. What they want is an opportunity to work and enjoy the fruits of their labor in decent wages. The appalling unemployment situation constitutes the most distressing economic condition that has ever confronted the American people. It is all very well to balance the Budget, but to people who are unemployed and starving the balancing of the Budget does not mean a great deal or afford them any immediate relief. Soviet Russia, with $200,000,000 or less in gold, has been able to set up an enormous public-works program, but we hesitate to spend a dollar or even to plan in advance for an emergency building program. The policy of the Nation should be to spend millions or billions, if necessary, on needed public works in this emergency but not one cent for doles.

We are still the richest nation in the world, and yet we hesitate to approve a $2,000,000,000 bond issue to relieve unemployment. Private and municipal relief is almost exhausted and Congress should not adjourn without presenting a constructive economic program for a 2-year public-works program, backed by a limited bond issue. If we could raise $25,000,000,000 through bond issues in 18 months to help win the World War, we can certainly raise $2,000,000,000 at the present time for purposes of peace and in behalf of our own unemployed.

I favor an emergency relief bond issue of $2,000,000,000, to be paid for by a 1 per cent general manufacturers' sales tax, which would bring in $200,000,000 annually, and I believe the American people would be glad to make the sacrifice in this national emergency for the following purposes:

One billion to go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans for productive purposes, $300,000,000 for loans to States and municipalities that are in actual need of funds, $500,000,000 for needed public works, roads, rivers and harbors improvements, public buildings, and so forth, and $200,000,000 for direct relief purposes, such as food and clothing for destitute Americans.

I believe that conservative business men and the American Federation of Labor would be willing to join forces in urging such a relief program, and I am convinced that the American public would give its immediate and whole-hearted support. It is utterly absurd to contend that a $2,000,000,000 bond issue would undermine the finances of the United States. I am unwilling to admit that the American people have been whipped by the depression and are so completely beaten financially that they can not raise $2,000,000,000 by a bond issue to help solve the most vital issue in the country—that of helping to provide jobs for the unemployed—and in case of failure of private charity and State and municipal aid to furnish food and clothing to the needy.

The Federal Government can not permit a single American wage earner or his family to starve when there is an abundance of foodstuffs in the land, or to freeze next winter when there is ample clothing and fuel.

I opposed the Garner bill, because it was hastily drawn up and provided for innumerable small post offices which were not needed and caused the whole bill to reek with political pork. Unemployment relief should be a nonpartisan issue and should be worked out on a carefully considered program covering a period of at least two years for needed public works and providing for human relief, if necessary.

I deplore the fact that the Congress did not take up this issue many months ago, in a nonpartisan spirit, for the purpose of adopting a national program of needed public works in this emergency. As it is, the Garner bill was framed almost overnight a few weeks ago and contains no well-considered economic plan or program beyond a few old rivers and harbors projects and a lot of useless post offices which would simply increase the already large annual deficit of the Post Office Department. It is a monstrosity of inefficiency, waste, extravagance, and political pork.

I am convinced that a careful study made on a nonpartisan basis could have provided a worth-while constructive program of public works, which would have taken care of at least a million unemployed and been productive, useful, and advantageous to the country.

I trust that the Senate will provide ample appropriations to take care of all the post offices with gross receipts of over $20,000 that have already been authorized by law. I believe that there are a large number of the Republican Members of the House who would be glad of an opportunity to vote for a limited bond issue to take care of such a building program and for all essential public works.

The doctrine has always been understood and taught that in times of depression the Government should authorize large constructive building programs, and that in time of prosperity private industry would provide work throughout the country.

It would be a sheer act of cowardice and an admission by the Congress that it has not the ability or the competency to relieve the unemployment situation if it adjourns without passing a constructive public-works program.

THE COST OF MANUFACTURING SULPHATE OF AMMONIA IN NEW YORK STATE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the cost of making sulphate of ammonia is $32 a ton and actual out-of-pocket cost approximately $20 a ton, when no value whatsoever is placed on the 500 pounds of ammonia which go to make up a ton of sulphate of ammonia. The costs at our plants are among the lowest in the country, due to a modern plant and a favorable market for raw materials. The net return from sulphate for the fertilizer year 1931–32 is approximately one-third of the pre-war price, and the return to the producer is less than the value of the labor and materials that go into the product.

Until July, 1931, the decline in the price of sulphate since the war was largely due to competition with synthetic nitrogen-fixing plants. This is fair and to be expected, but the American producer is protesting against the dumping of the products of government-subsidized European plants that has taken place since July, 1931, at prices from $3 to $16 per ton below the sales price in the country of origin. Our plants have not asked for a duty but have only asked the Treasury Department to put into effect the already existing antidumping law.

Most foreign governments, the latest one of which is Japan, have absolutely closed their doors to the importation of nitrogen products of all kinds, either by high tariff, license, or embargo, and in one way or another subsidized plants for the production of nitrogen which can be used for fertilizers in time of peace and for the production of munitions in time of war. The United States is the only large free country for nitrogen products left in the world. Japan, which until lately was one of the largest importers of sulphate in the world, is now exporting sulphate to our west coast at prices materially under their home prices.

United States to-day has facilities for the production of nitrogen which insure cheap nitrogen fertilizers in time of peace and ample protection in time of war. It does not seem wise that these facilities should be sacrificed to provide Japan and European countries with an outlet for their surplus material from plants which are part of their national war system.

The prices of nitrogen fertilizers to-day are much less than the cost of production would be at Muscle Shoals, if this plant were in operation.

Following the Treasury hearing of Monday, April 11, there were some statements made on the floor of the House and in the Senate that were erroneous and not based on the facts. On Thursday, April 14, Mr. FULMER made a statement, recorded on page 8267 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is erroneous, according to our plant figures. On April 23 Mr. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, made a statement on the floor of the House, recorded on page 8804 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that sulphate of ammonia could be produced as a by-product for from $10 to $12 a ton, and that steel companies who produced it are trying to make the farmers pay $30 a ton for it. Actual facts, as I have them, are that the acid alone, which goes into a ton of sulphate of ammonia, costs the producers of sulphate more than the figures mentioned.

As the Representative of a State which is a large producer of sulphate of ammonia, most of which is shipped to the South and nets the manufacturer in the State of New York, after a freight of from $5 to $6 a ton is paid, very much less than the cost of production, I believe I should inform the House of the facts as it applies to the production of sulphate in my city.

These statistics are taken from the United States Department of Labor: While prices of farm products have declined during the year of 1931 to January, 1932, from 64.8 per cent of 1926 prices to 52.8 per cent, and fertilizer materials in general have declined from 76.8 per cent of 1926 prices to 69.9 per cent, sulphate of ammonia in New York State has declined from 55 per cent of 1926 prices to 40.9 per cent.

FAIR PLAY FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have consistently opposed discrimination in connection with the proposed salary cuts for Government employees. I contend that if you are to reduce salaries either by a direct cut or a furlough plan, then apply the same treatment to all and stop.

Now, for instance, the postal employees are not only affected by the straight cut but they also lose other allowances which means money, and instead of reducing their pay once the bill provides for several reductions.

The furlough plan eliminates the rural carrier, but he suffers a reduction by the elimination of five-eighths of his equipment allowance. The rural carrier must provide an automobile or a horse and buggy, or sometimes both. What happens to the rural carrier compared with the Government employee, say, in Washington?

I submit a table which gives you an idea. The conferees should give this matter some attention, because if they do not you will find this class of Government employees discriminated against.

The table follows:

Table showing how furlough discriminates against rural carrier

Length of route (miles)	Salary	Net equipment allowance	Five-eighths deduction	Furlough applied to others	Net loss to rural carrier

Mr. Speaker, if seven-sixteenths is withheld from the present equipment allowance of rural carriers, instead of five-eighths, as proposed, the above discrimination will be relieved.

Mr. Speaker, the above table shows the rural carrier who gets $3,180 and an allowance of $814.80 suffering a reduction of $508 when you deprive him of five-eighths of his allowance. His total salary and allowance from the Government for covering a route 70 miles in length is $3,994.80. The Government official who receives $10,000 a year suffers a reduction under the furlough plan of $833.33. Is such a plan fair to the rural carrier? There is going to be a reduction in the amount now received by all Government employees where the salary is over $1,200 if either the Senate or House conferees' plan is agreed to. If all are treated alike, there will be less complaint. Do not pick out the postal employees and reduce their annual income more than you do the Government employee who works in the Treasury, Department of Commerce, or any other Government agency. All the postal employees are asking is fair play. Strike out the features of the bill that discriminate against these faithful employees. I feel they are entitled to fair play; that is all they ask.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 14, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

IMPORTS OF FOREIGN STEEL

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of this Congress the seriousness of the importation of steel products made in foreign countries and which in the last year deprived 237,130 American steel workers of one week's full-time employment.

The full details of this matter are contained in the following communication from the Bittenbender Co., of Scranton, Pa., which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCRANTON, PA., June 11, 1932.

Senator JAMES J. DAVIS,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: You are no doubt familiar with the fact the Scranton School District have just awarded a contract for the construction of the new junior high school in West Scranton.

As distributors of iron and steel products, we, of course, were interested in the sale of the required steel bars among which are a number to be used as reinforcing in the plastering job. S. & W. Crunden, plastering contractors in our city, hope to get this job, in which event they would like to place the steel order with us or some other local distributor. However, they have had competitive figures from a Philadelphia distributor, which figures were so far below our cost we could not understand how that could be possible so the matter was taken up with the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., our source of supply. Upon doing so we learned, much to our disgust, that the lower prices quoted S. & W. Crunden covered foreign steel, which material Mr. Crunden will have to figure on for the simple reason that those against whom he is competing will undoubtedly do so.

We are informed by the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. that the very lowest price they can consider—which price under present conditions is undoubtedly below actual cost—is $2.89 per hundredweight f. o. b. Scranton. This price of $2.89 per hundredweight is the equivalent of $11.56 per thousand feet of material. The price quoted S. & W. Crunden on the foreign steel is $7.50 per thousand feet, so you can readily see how impossible it is for American manufacturers to meet this competition.

Knowing the local authorities would, if it were possible, prevent the use of this foreign steel in the construction of the new school, the writer has taken the matter up with them; but, of course, there is nothing they can do about it, inasmuch as its use is not excluded in the original plans and specifications that the general contractor had in figuring the job.

We are bringing this to your attention in detail, urging your support of the Hawley bill, H. R. 8688, when it is brought before the Senate.

We are informed by the American Steel Warehouse Association, of Philadelphia, that it is estimated approximately 237,130 men lost a week's work in 1931 due to the importation of all grades of steel. Statistics show that in 1931, 369,923 net tons of all classes of steel were imported, causing a loss to our steel industry, with corresponding loss to thousands of workers who mine the ore, the coal operators and their employees, the loss of tonnage of railroads on the raw materials and coal, all of which aggravated the unemployment situation.

We know this will receive your careful consideration, and thanking you, we are,

Yours very truly,

THE BITTENBENDER CO.,
C. S. SEAMANS, Sales Manager.

BACK TO THE FARM

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a communication signed by Maj. G. M. Randall, M. D., of Daytona Beach, Fla., relative to the "back to the farm" movement, which was published in a recent issue of Truth and Justice, of Jacksonville, Fla., which presents some views worthy of consideration. I ask unanimous consent to have the communication printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Truth and Justice, June 10, 1932]

BACK TO THE FARM

Georgia, Florida, and Alabama are one great rich empire. Alabama is the great beautiful park, capable of supporting with ease and luxury as many people to the square mile as is Massachusetts or Connecticut, which have about 630 people to the square mile. Florida has about 30 people to the square mile; Georgia and Alabama, about 40 to the square mile. Georgia and Alabama could assimilate and support all of the 8,000,000 unemployed people. Florida alone could do this with ease. In neither of these States could a man, woman, or child freeze or starve.

It is a reproach on the intelligence of the Nation that we do not do for our deserving people what other countries do for their people who need encouragement and assistance. Nothing is gained to the individual or the Nation by a dole or anything that resembles a dole. Many projects suggested are little better than a dole. Railroads, canals, and post offices are necessary. Highways and schools are factors of civilization. But before we have all of these things we must have need for them and ability to support them. We need sustenance before we need luxuries. Before bank accounts come food, shelter, and the comforts of home.

Now, what's to do? Let the counties, States, and the Federal Government get together, combine forces, cooperate, and populate these misused acres, these unusual acres.

We have State departments of agriculture with county agents to assist and advise the new farmers. We have the United States Department of Agriculture, which expends more money than any other department of the United States Government, and expends it well.

There are thousands of deserted farms and farm buildings that could be rehabilitated to individual, State, and National advantage. There is not a railroad running north and south that would decline to assist in the transportation of honest homeseekers to places in the South.

Winter is coming. Why not take time by the forelock instead of by the horns? Get about a million of these people down here building shacks and log cabins, repairing old houses, getting ready for 1933 crops. Conduct the thing along military lines. They have to be assisted. Why not assist them to assist themselves later? This is not the last year they are going to need to make a living.

All of this talk about an excess of agricultural products is bunk. The fault is merchandizing and transportation. We are not advising farmers to try raising a money crop the first year. It is a grub stake that interests him just now. After his family is fed and have a roof over their heads he can talk about a money crop and bank account, but until our banking system is properly diagnosed and treated, the farmer is better off with a full corn crib and a few hogs than he is with a few hundred dollars in the bank. There ought to be less talk about cash and more about hogs and hominy.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOSSES OF COOPERATIVE MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, and I request that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 4883) directing the Federal Farm Board to assume certain losses of cooperative marketing associations, and to prevent further sales during 1932 of wheat and cotton under the control of said board, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if any cooperative marketing association has incurred losses as a result of activities in which it was required to engage by the terms of any contract by which it received a loan from the Federal Farm Board, the board is authorized and directed to reimburse such association for such losses. So far as possible, such reimbursement shall be by cancellation of outstanding obligations or any part thereof of such association to the board; but if such losses exceed the amount of such obligations, reimbursement as to the remainder shall be by payment out of the revolving fund created by the agricultural marketing act.

SEC. 2. The Federal Farm Board shall take such steps as are necessary to prevent the selling of any wheat or cotton by any stabilization corporation during the remainder of the calendar year 1932. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, from time to time, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse such corporations for expenses resulting from carrying out the provisions of this section.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM—AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

INCORPORATION OF DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on yesterday I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. 4738) to incorporate Disabled American Veterans of the World War. This organization of most deserving citizens, who have suffered in the cause of their country, is to have its national convention at San Diego during the following week. The officers of the organization are just leaving to take part in that convention. Under these circumstances I feel moved to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, to wit, Robert S. Marx, of Ohio; William J. Donovan, of New York; H. G. Lightner, of Kentucky; A. B. Powell, of Alabama; Glenn E. PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—ADDRESS BY MRS. OSIAS

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, as in America, the Philippine women are taking an interest in securing freedom for their islands.

The Filipino women occupy an unusually high place in their nation. All historians testify to this. They usually keep the bank account and the savings. They are the financial managers. Their chief passion is education of their children. They will make any sacrifice to send them to school.

One of these very intelligent and patriotic women is the wife of the industrious, scholarly Commissioner from the Philippines.

I ask unanimous consent to insert the address of Mrs. Ildefonsa C. Osias before the Woman's National Party, June 1, 1932, Washington, D. C., in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FILIPINO WOMAN AND PHILIPPINE POLITICS

I am glad to be with you once again. Last time I was asked to speak before this organization, I attempted to picture to you the general condition of the people of the Philippine Islands and the status of women in society. This time I was asked specifically to speak for a few minutes on the Filipino Woman and Philippine Politics.

Before speaking directly upon the topic, I believe it is necessary to impress upon you that the Filipino woman occupies a high place in our social organization. I believe that it will be generally admitted that the Filipino woman exerts her greatest influence in the institution where she is the queen, namely, the home. She is essentially a family person. Her most important mission is done in her capacity as a home lover and home maker. I think you will find the testimonies of writers to be unanimous in according her great importance within the family as she has control of the family purse.

Let me quote a typical observation from a man who, from long contact and study, is qualified to speak of social conditions in the islands. Former Governor General Forbes in his book, the Philippine Islands (Vol. I, p. 17), says:

"The Christian Filipino woman holds a very different position in the family from that given to her sisters in India or in most oriental countries. She is usually the business manager of the household, keeps the keys, does the providing, receives all cash earned by any member of the family, including the proceeds from the farm produce, and supervises the expenditure. It is she who makes the budget. A man who fails to turn in his receipts for his wife's direction somewhat injures his standing in the community."

Filipino women have shouldered their full share in the life of our people. This is true not only in time of peace but even in war. At present Filipino women are not only active in family affairs but in business affairs. In agriculture, as well as in commerce, they are actively engaged.

Furthermore, they are active in the professions. They are each year increasing in numbers in the professions of teaching, nursing, pharmacy, medicine, and law. Their number is destined to grow rapidly because one of the most significant signs of progress in the Philippines in recent years has been the increasing proportion of girls and young women in the secondary schools, colleges, and universities in the Philippines.

Now, you ask me, "Do you have woman suffrage?" My answer is "No." But this does not mean that the Filipino women have no part or influence in public affairs or in governmental or in political affairs. Will my American sisters admit that they had no influence in the affairs of this Nation before they had suffrage? I am sure they were as important in the early life of the people and Government of this country as they have been since they were by law entitled to vote. In fact, I have been told by some of my woman friends that mere suffrage has not brought about such a radical change as the women had expected. I have also been informed, although I do not vouch for its accuracy, that some women are not as much interested in politics after they secured the right to vote as they were while they were fighting for the right of suffrage.

Now, I do not want you to misunderstand me. I am personally in favor of woman suffrage. I have worked for it and will continue to work for it. You should, however, know certain facts which have a bearing upon the existing situation.

Under the present government, not even our men had the right to vote for insular or national officials until Congress passed a law establishing the Philippine Assembly. This assembly was the lower house in our lawmaking body inaugurated in 1907. We were not given a senate and the house of representatives until Congress passed a law authorizing the creation of the Philippine Legislature in 1916. And I assure you that in the elections held in the Philippines, we, the Filipino women, have had a greater part than the outside world will ever know and, I may add, more than the candidates who won or were defeated will ever admit.

You who are familiar with the long struggle extending over a period of so many years before the American women enjoyed the right of suffrage will readily understand that, in reality, we have scarcely begun in our fight in the Philippines.

I should also inform you that the law governing the management of our government to-day was the act of Congress passed in 1916. This law, among other things, prescribed the qualifications of voters and candidates. These qualifications were limited to men, and women were excluded.

These are the qualifications prescribed by the act of your Congress:

"Every male person," please note that—"every male person who is not a citizen or subject of a foreign power, 21 years of age or over (except insane and feeble-minded persons and those convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction of an infamous offense since the 13th day of August, 1898), who shall have been a resident of the Philippines for one year and of the municipality in which he shall offer to vote for six months next preceding the day of voting, and who is comprised within one of the following classes:

"(a) Those who under existing law are legal voters and have exercised the right of suffrage.

"(b) Those who own real property to the value of 500 pesos, or who annually pay 30 pesos or more of the established taxes.

"(c) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish, English, or a native language." (Philippine autonomy act—act of Congress of August 29, 1916; Public, No. 240, 64th Cong., sec. 15.)

The amendment to the Constitution regarding woman suffrage has not been made applicable to the Philippines.

From these it is clear why things are as they are in the Philippines.

It should be stated that there is general interest in elections in the islands. I think it is at least in part due to the work and influence of women. At each general election which was so far held, from 85 per cent to 92 per cent of the Philippine voters who can vote actually vote. I understand this is much higher than the proportion voting in the United States.

You might also be interested to know that several employers and officials in the government are women; that there are women in charge of some of the larger and important schools and colleges; that there are women in various boards of governmental and private bodies and organizations; and that they have a controlling voice in various organizations undertaking works of mercy, of charity, of uplift, and of reform.

Let me impress upon my friends here who are in sympathy with the desires of the Filipino women for suffrage that militant efforts are not welcomed by the men in the islands and are contrary to the nature of our women. It is not in accord with our national custom. We can best achieve political concessions and other reforms by quiet work and dignified methods.

We, the women of the islands, are whole-heartedly identified with our brothers in the belief that more important than reforms of a purely local or domestic character is the independence of the entire Philippines. We are not discouraged by any means and we are desirous to help concentrate our chief efforts toward securing the passage of a bill that would grant our independence as soon as possible.

As the members of the Woman's National Party doubtless know, the House of Representatives recently passed an independence bill by a very large majority, 306 for and 47 against, to be exact. It is now pending in the Senate, and the hope of all Filipinos, men and women alike, is that action will be taken on an independence measure without delay.

If the members of this organization and the Americans in general wish to help the Filipino people and at the same time serve the United States, they should exert their influence to have an independence bill become a law. Speaking directly to those who are interested that the Filipino women should have suffrage, let me say that this is the great opportunity. We shall then be able to work during the consideration of the constitution for the Philippine Commonwealth for a provision that will secure for the women of the islands the right of suffrage, effective with the date when independence will be granted. The delay of the grant of Philippine independence is responsible in a great measure for the uncertainty in all phases of our national life. Its early grant will hasten development in our country. It will release much time and effort and energy now given to our fight for an independent national existence for the purpose of effecting reforms in our domestic life, including woman suffrage. It will greatly stimulate our women to take greater interest in Philippine politics.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—ADDRESS BY MAURO BARADI

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, both the House committee and the Senate committee earnestly requested the names of any Filipinos who are opposing independence. I believe only seven were given in both hearings.

The unanimity of the Filipino people in demanding their independence is testified to by all of the modern writers and historians. It is a thing they place above every other consideration.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address by Mauro Baradi, president of the Filipino Club (Inc.) and the Philippine Columbians, before the Filipino Club of Washington, showing how clearly the Filipinos understand the subject and how earnestly and intelligently they make their appeals for freedom.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROMISE UNFULFILLED

Just after the Spanish-American War in 1898, when the United States took possession of the Philippine Islands, it was said that President McKinley at first did not know what to do with the archipelago. He spent days and nights trying to decide what course to follow.

AMERICA'S PHILIPPINE POLICY

In the meantime some American newspapers were advocating annexation, others indefinite retention, and still others turning over the territory to the Filipinos themselves. Public opinion was divided. Finally, after meditation and prayer, the President reached a decision.

Later he made a formal declaration announcing America's policy toward the Philippines in these solemn words:

"The Philippines are ours not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us."

This stand has been followed by every succeeding President regardless of party affiliation—Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Frequently it has been referred to with approval in the planks of the major political parties.

A SACRED PLEDGE

To make the pronouncement absolutely official, the people and Government of the United States of America, of their own accord, passed the Jones law—act of Congress of August 29, 1916—which, in unmistakable terms, states that—

"* * * It was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

"* * * It is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein * * *."

Pursuant to this pledge, the Filipinos were given an opportunity to run their own government and conduct their own affairs. In all modesty it must be said that not only did they make commendable progress but were successful. So much so that President Wilson, in his message to Congress on December 7, 1920, said:

"Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands. I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

A GOD-GIVEN RIGHT

Year after year the Filipinos have sent and are still sending their duly authorized spokesmen to the United States to voice the unanimous desire of their people for independence. Impartial observers have expressed the conviction that they "found no people in the world so unitedly, so passionately, so insistently desiring independence as the Filipinos." This desire is not new. It dates back to the days prior to the time when the first European set foot on Philippine soil in 1521. That year Magellan, the first circumnavigator of the world, lost his life in an attempt to impose a tribute upon the inhabitants of the archipelago and to subdue them. Spain's rule in the islands, covering a period of about 375 years, was marked by revolution after revolution on the part of the people for freedom. And when America appeared on the scene the Filipinos were led to believe that they were going to have their God-given right to be free and independent.

FILIPINOS ENCOURAGED

American soldiers were looked upon as defenders from tyranny and abuse: the missionaries were hailed as bearers of the gospel of truth, Christianity, and brotherhood; American officials, teachers, business men, and travelers—these gave the impression of the Americans being bearers of "the richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation."

Filipino children, who have a proverbial passion for education, were taught English as the language of enlightenment, democracy, and progress; they studied the works of great American authors, learned the writings of American statesmen, and were told to revere American heroes and liberators. The Filipinos observe American holidays. On July 4 of each year they join the citizens of this Republic in programs, parades, and other forms of celebration, where the Declaration of Independence is read and speeches on liberty, freedom, equality, and independence are delivered.

In view of these facts, could anyone doubt the sincerity of the Filipinos' aspiration for independence? To them freedom is sacred; it is more precious than the world's riches. No people can really be happy unless they are absolutely free.

INDEPENDENCE OVERDUE

More than a decade has now elapsed since President Wilson recommended to Congress the redemption of America's solemn pledge. Right now Filipino leaders are knocking at the very doors of Congress that that great body may hear their oft-repeated pleas. These leaders appeared before appropriate committees in the American Senate and House of Representatives and brought out facts and figures proving that the Philippines are ready to assume the responsibilities of a sovereign state. Politically, the Filipinos are capable, socially and culturally they can be favorably compared with most of the independent nations of the world; economically, they are progressing, and, if independent, they will survive. They are a liberty-loving, law-abiding, and peaceful people, friendly with their neighbors.

CONGRESS AGAIN SPEAKS

What better proof can the Filipinos offer in support of their age-long objective than to cite the conclusions found by the United States Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and the House Committee on Insular Affairs?

After extensive hearings on the Philippine bills granting freedom, the Senate committee favorably reported an independence bill—S. 3377—commonly known as the Hawes-Cutting bill. On March 1, 1932, the committee concluded that—

"Every condition precedent that we have imposed upon them has been fulfilled. They now have a stable government. We can no longer postpone a definite solution of the question of independence without serious injustice. The Filipino people unitedly are respectfully, but with insistence, urging their independence. Further delay will not be understood by them and can not be justified by us."

For its part, the House committee reported on March 15, 1932, as follows:

"Our purpose in the Philippines has been accomplished. The unity of the people there is a fact. Their readiness and their eagerness for self-government have been abundantly demonstrated. Their financial capacity to support their government is beyond question. They have a balanced budget, a stable currency, a sound and efficient administration of justice, a successful system of public instruction. They have sanitation, communications, and all other services which are indispensable to progressive and orderly government. They maintain law and order through their own instrumentalities and assure protection to their own citizens and the nationals of other countries. Their educational and economic standards are higher than those in other countries in that part of the world. Under our inspiration and tutoring they have come to understand and prize and covet democracy. They recognize their debt of gratitude to the American people.

"We have done for the Filipinos all that we have promised them except to grant them independence. We owe it not only to the Filipino people but also to our own to name the day and the way of Philippine independence."

It is a great source of satisfaction to feel that the House of Representatives, in line with the findings of the House committee, has already expressed its hearty approval to and unqualified indorsement of a Philippine independence bill. On April 4, 1932—a memorable day in American-Philippine relations—by an overwhelming vote of 306 in favor and 47 against, the House passed "A bill (H. R. 7233) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes." The vote was "one of the greatest majorities in parliamentary annals."

The Senate has now pending for its consideration the independence bill, and our hope is that that great body will soon take action on it. When the measure is passed the Chief Executive of the Nation, who has said that "independence of the Philippines at some time has been directly or indirectly promised by every President and by the Congress," will take the final step.

AMERICA ON TRIAL

In the meantime, the Filipinos are awaiting with anxiety the outcome of their just petition to be free. They believe in America and have faith in her people. They know that if she has fought for the cause of small nations and championed the principle of self-determination, she can not deny the Filipinos their independence—a cause for which she herself has sacrificed lives and property, an ideal which she holds priceless.

A QUESTION UNANSWERED

We repeat, the United States pledged to grant independence to the Philippines. That promise has been honorably made; it has been voluntarily expressed. The Filipinos have done their part and they are now waiting for the people of America to do theirs. "When will you free us?" This is the question the Filipinos are asking of every American.

The world took cognizance of the promise made; mankind knows it has as yet been unfulfilled.

LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR—ADDRESS BY ALFRED K. NIPPERT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an eloquent address on the life, character, and public services of the late Associate Justice Lucius Q. C. Lamar, of my State, recently delivered by Judge Alfred K. Nippert, of Cincinnati, Ohio, at the University of Mississippi on the occasion of the presentation of an oil portrait of Justice Lamar.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On the 24th day of January, 1893, Prof. A. H. Whitfield, of the law department of the University of Mississippi, moved the United States court, then in session at Oxford, Miss., to "adjourn in honor of the greatest statesman of the South." The man referred to was Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar, Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who had passed to his reward the evening before, at Vineville, Ga., where he had gone to recuperate from an illness of long standing.

The late justice was born at the old Lamar homestead in Putnam County, Ga., on September 17, 1825, the son of Judge Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar, who had attained distinction as a lawyer and judge in the courts of his native State, where his family had settled at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War. The Lamars were of old Huguenot stock, having escaped from France and the terrors of the religious persecutions incident to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and first settled in Maryland.

The father of the late justice was one of 9 children—4 sons and 5 daughters. The sons were named, respectively, Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus, Mirabeau Bonaparte, Thomas Randolph, and Jefferson Jackson. The one guilty of this baptismal impediment placed upon these boys at the christening font of the Methodist Church was a bachelor uncle of these innocent babes, by the name of Zachariah Lamar. Zachariah was a quaint old character—he offered family prayer in good old Methodist fashion, praised God for the noble examples of Christian martyrdom in the arenas of Rome and Pompeii, gave thanks to God for the forward march of science, art, and especially literature; and, to show his appreciation of the great men in history, he proceeded to name his brother's children according to the particular historical personage of whom he was reading at the time of their birth. So it happened that Uncle Zachariah was reading about that grand old Roman hero and statesman, Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus, when his brother John's first son was born. What better name could be given to this first-born of the fifth generation of the American Lamars than that of the famous twice savior of Rome? And Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus it was. This illustrious name has since been handed down to son, grandson, and great-grandson of the Lamars as time and years rolled by.

Young Lamar, following the footsteps of his distinguished father, was admitted to the Mississippi bar in the year 1850. The agitation between the North and the South had already begun to take hold of the various States of the Union, but nowhere was the excitement more intense and the reaction more profound than in the State of Mississippi. It was at that time that Mr. Lamar became first actively connected with the University of Mississippi, as adjunct professor of mathematics and metaphysics. His distinguished father-in-law, Judge A. B. Longstreet, was then president of this institution, having resigned the presidency of Emory College, Georgia, to assume a wider field of usefulness as head of the State University of Mississippi. Young Lucius Lamar had been a student and member of the class of 1845 at Emory College. While there he fell in love with Virginia Lafayette Longstreet, the beautiful daughter of the then president of Emory College—a brave but risky adventure on the part of the young Roman. Within two years the fair Virginia Longstreet became Mrs. Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar.

In 1855 the young lawyer purchased a plantation of 1,100 acres on the Tallahatchie River, near Oxford, Miss., and called it "Solitude." It was at this time that he formed a law partnership with Christopher H. Mott and James L. Autrey, under the firm name of Lamar, Mott & Autrey, with offices at Holly Springs, Miss. Mott was a veteran of the Mexican War and served as first lieutenant in the Marshall Guards under Col. Jefferson Davis. Autrey was a Tennessean, the son of one of that immortal band of heroes who suffered death at the Alamo in the cause of Texan independence. This happy professional relationship between the three men continued until the outbreak of the Civil War.

Lamar in 1857 was nominated and elected to Congress from the first congressional district of Mississippi, but only after a very bitter and strenuous campaign against his opponent, a candidate supported by the so-called Know-Nothing Party. Reelected in 1859, he served only part of the Thirty-sixth Session of Congress, retiring in December, 1860, when the election of Mr. Lincoln brought the South face to face with a tremendous problem.

Lamar believed it possible to form an independent Southern Confederacy. At the Jackson convention in January, 1861, he reported to the Committee of One Hundred the Mississippi ordinance of secession, which he himself had drafted. As this portentous ordinance passed by an overwhelming vote of 85 to 15, a profound silence prevailed in the great hall and tears gathered in the eyes of nearly everyone present. The die had been cast—the South had crossed the Rubicon, while in the North many an irreconcilable Cato hurled across the borders of the Confederacy the ultimatum of ancient Rome, "Carthaginem esse delendam"; and the South has to this day not yet recovered fully from the awful consequences which followed the passage of this ordinance of 1861.

As my esteemed friend, the late Judge Edward B. Mayes, former chancellor of the University of Mississippi, stated so eloquently in his monumental work on Lamar, His Life and Times: "The actors in the secession knew that they were turning their backs upon the structure every stone of which was baptized by the blood of their fathers and the tears of their mothers, and that the old flag which their fathers and themselves had borne from glory to glory was from thenceforth to be alien and possibly hostile. They loved the Union—but they believed in the principles and methods which were purely economical and moral to the States which later on formed the Confederacy. They may have been mistaken in their principles and they may have been wrong in their methods; nevertheless, at that time they felt that right, justice, and the Constitution were with them, and so the die was cast and Mississippi entered into the irreparable and unavoidable conflict."

James G. Blaine, who served with Lamar in the United States Senate, later on said of him that "He stood firmly by his State in accordance with the political creed in which he had been reared, but looked back with tender regret to the Union whose destiny he had wished to share and under the protection of whose broader nationality he had hoped to live and die."

On February 4, 1861, the convention of States met at Montgomery, Ala. Lamar was a delegate and helped elect Jefferson Davis as Provisional President. He assisted in the adoption of a constitution and drew the legislation for the young Confederacy.

Christopher Mott, Lamar's law partner, organized the Nineteenth Mississippi Regiment, of which he was elected colonel, and Lamar lieutenant colonel. Both Mott and Lamar went with the regiment to Richmond, Va., and then immediately into the Peninsular campaign. On the 5th of May, 1862, the Battle of Williamsburg occurred, and in this battle Mott fell, at the head of the regiment, leading his men. After the fall of his commander Lieutenant Colonel Lamar led the charge the remainder of the day and acquitted himself creditably throughout this long and stubbornly contested fight. Soon afterward Lamar was seized by a serious illness and was sent home. In September of that year he lost his younger brother, Jefferson Lamar, who, as lieutenant colonel of Cobb's Legion of Georgia, fell when leading a charge at Cramptons Gap in the Blue Ridge Mountains of Maryland. A cousin of Jefferson and Lucius, Col. John B. Lamar, was also mortally wounded in the same engagement. In 1864 he lost his elder and only surviving brother, Thomas B. Lamar, colonel of the Fifth Florida, who was killed in battle in front of Petersburg, Va. In the same year the junior partner of the firm of Lamar, Mott & Autrey was killed in the Battle of Murfreesboro, Tenn. Yea—secession was exacting heavy tribute and priceless treasures from the bleeding South!

About this time the old wooden sign of the law firm, Lamar, Mott & Autrey, which for many years had been idly swinging over the office door at Holly Springs, Miss., was found floating on the waters of the Mississippi—a derelict on its way to the mighty ocean and an ominous foreboding of the wreckage that was to follow the useless sacrifices of this noble triumvirate of southern jurists.

In October, 1862, Colonel Lamar resigned his colonelcy of the Nineteenth Mississippi, and in November was appointed by Jefferson Davis as special commissioner of the Confederate States to the Empire of Russia. His credentials were signed by J. P. Benjamin, the famous Louisiana lawyer, then Secretary of State for the Confederacy. Mr. Lamar returned from his European mission, which included also England, France, and Germany, in January, 1863. He concluded his military services as Judge Advocate in the Third Army Corps, with the rank of colonel of cavalry. After Appomattox, April 9, 1865, he sent the following message to his fellow officers:

"I shall stay with my people and share their fate. I feel it my duty to devote my life to the alleviation, so far as in my power lies, of the sufferings which this day's disaster will entail upon them."

The surrender of General Lee to General Grant was followed by that of General Johnson to General Sherman, April 26, 1865, and General Taylor to General Canby, May 4, 1865; so that when Colonel Lamar started home from Richmond, as he did on May 16, 1865, the war was indeed ended.

Then followed the hopeless and despairing years of the post bellum days. I will not honor this period—in the light of history—by referring to it as the "reconstruction period." It was rather the "period of destruction," where the victor, like Brennus in the forum of ancient Rome, exacted impossible tributes from the conquered peoples with the words, "Vae victis" (woe unto the vanquished).

To quote again from Chancellor Mayes: "To the southern people the future held little hope, the present was full of trouble and suffering. During the long and bitter struggle for the principles which they cherished, a struggle in which they believed themselves to have acted always on the defensive, they had suffered so bravely and so much. The very women and children at home had gone hungry and ill clad; all domestic happiness had been surrendered for years; all the able-bodied men from 16 to 60 had been sent away to the hardships and dangers of the battlefields; all profitable industries had been renounced; private fortunes had been poured into the army chest; the very fields, for want of markets for their products, had been abandoned and desolated; the terrors of invading hosts had been endured; the homes and the cities had been given up to pillage and the torch; the names of a thousand bloody fields had been written upon the tablets of their memories with indelible tears; in every household for years had been borne the daily torturing dread—a dread to be displaced only by the crowning sorrow of the fact—of the loss of the bravest and best beloved; the throne of the omnipotent God had been hourly besieged with groans and prayers and supplications—and all to what end? To this: That not only the humiliation of conquest awaited them, the loss of fortune and of honorable estate in the councils of nations, but also that their honor was challenged; the decision of the sword, which so sternly settles facts, never yet in truth settled a question of right and wrong, either political or moral. The railroads had been torn up to a great extent, many of the cities were in ruins, no crops had been gathered for three years, all movables had been consumed by the war. A free population, containing 5,000,000 people, had lost over two thousand millions of dollar values. Clothing was scarce, food even more so, and their money valueless. The floors of the dwellings had been stripped, the carpets having been used in lieu of blankets, and many families of refinement and former wealth were without the commonest articles of household and table furniture. The grim specter of poverty sat at their firesides and confronted them at their table."

The situation seemed hopeless in June, 1866, when Colonel Lamar returned to the chair of ethics and metaphysics at the University of Mississippi. It was during that year that he, with the late Judge Charles B. Howry, founded on the campus of the University of Mississippi the Mississippi Gamma Chapter of Sigma Alpha Epsilon. Colonel Lamar during the period of the Civil War had met a number of young volunteers from the various chapters of this Greek-letter fraternity, which was founded on the campus of the University of Alabama in the year 1856, and whose founder, Noble Leslie DeVotie, was to be the first sacrifice on the altar of this Confederacy. Seventy-five per cent of the young Sigma Alpha Epsilon collegians enlisted in the war and more than half of their number were counted among the casualties of the battlefields.

There was recently dedicated by the same Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity at Evanston, Ill., on the shores of Lake Michigan a magnificent memorial chapel in memory of the members of this fraternity who died on the fields of battle since the founding of the order in 1856. More than 7,000 of them enlisted in the World War, and 150 made the supreme sacrifice on Flanders Field, whose memories are honored with the heroes of the Civil War, both northern and southern, in this magnificent Gothic temple—in so far as I know, the only great monument erected to the Nation's dead regardless of the Mason and Dixon's line. One of the finest memorial windows in the temple is the window, designed by Tiffany, dedicated to the memory of L. Q. C. Lamar, in recognition of the great service which this distinguished statesman and jurist rendered his people and his fraternity. One section of this window represents Lamar delivering his famous and historic eulogy on Sumner on the floor of Congress April 28, 1874. The other section shows him as he took the oath of office as one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States on the 18th of January, 1888. The central section depicts the figure of justice holding her scales in balance.

In January, 1867, Colonel Lamar was unanimously elected to fill the chair of professor of law at the University of Mississippi, to which he was to give his entire and exclusive time. During these years his helpful counsel and advice did much to strengthen the ardor of the southern youth in their seemingly hopeless struggle for existence and education. However, in the spring of 1870 Lamar retired from the University of Mississippi, owing to the changes of administrative policies, which were of such a nature that he felt constrained to leave the university of his choice. When he left the university he admonished the graduates of his law school by saying:

"And now, young gentlemen, as you go home, I pray that you may have prosperity and happiness through life, with just enough sorrow to remind you that this earth is not your home."

In 1872 he again entered the national political arena. National politics had gone from bad to worse. The carpetbagger and corruptionist were enthroned in the South. In May, 1872, Lamar wrote in despair to a neighbor of mine at Cincinnati, the late Charles G. Reemlin:

"I fear, if this agony is prolonged without hope of relief at some period, the southern people will feel that death is better than life; and then despair and Nemesis will rule the hour. Such being the condition, the thought which presses upon every aching heart and head is not how to restore the constitutional faith of our fathers but how to get rid of these creatures, defiled by blood, gorged with spoil, cruel, cowardly, faithless, who are now ruling the South for no purposes except those of oppression and plunder."

In the same epistle to Reemlin, who was a strong supporter of Tilden, as against Hayes, for the Presidency in 1876, Mr. Lamar referred feelingly to Carl Schurz by saying:

"Carl Schurz is the only genuinely popular man in the country. The people think him patriotic, disinterested, and intellectual. They pine for a true man; one true in his principles, lofty in his manners, and a real genius. * * * Schurz has somehow touched their [the people's] hearts."

However, the end of the carpetbagger was not yet—in spite of Carl Schurz and other mature thinkers and statesmen of that period.

In 1873 Lamar's congressional ambitions were realized and he was returned as a member of the Mississippi delegation to the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses. His great opportunity to awaken the conscience of the North to the bitter wrongs that were inflicted upon his people by northern misrule came on the death of Hon. Charles Sumner, Member of Congress from Massachusetts and an ardent abolitionist of the New England type. At the request of the Massachusetts delegation he delivered a eulogy on the life and character of Senator Sumner on the floor of Congress, April 28, 1874, amidst crowded galleries. This speech marked the turning point of the so-called "reconstruction period" and changed the triumphant attitude of the North toward the vanquished and prostrate South. Lamar's eulogy of Sumner has gone down in history as one of the greatest oratorical gems ever delivered on the floor of either House of Congress. His hearers sat in rapt attention as this southern gentleman proceeded with a brilliant analysis of Sumner's character. He reached the climax of his oration when he concluded his great effort, exclaiming:

"The South—prostrated, exhausted, drained of her lifeblood, as well as of her material resources, yet still honorable and true—accepts the bitter award of the bloody arbitrament without reservation, resolutely determined to abide the result with chivalrous fidelity; yet, as if struck dumb by the magnitude of her reverses, she suffers on in silence. The North, exultant in her triumph and elated by success, still cherishes, as we are assured, a heart full of magnanimous emotions toward her disarmed and discomfited antagonist; and yet, as if mastered by some mysterious spell, silencing her better impulses, her words and acts are the words and acts of suspicion and distrust. Would that the spirit of the illustrious dead whom we lament to-day could speak from the grave to both parties to this deplorable discord in tones which would reach each and every heart throughout this broad territory 'My countrymen! Know each other better and you will love each other more!'"

He had awakened the sleeping conscience of the North. The South felt that at last a champion worthy of her cause had entered the lists to bring the tragic era of reconstruction and the reign of terror of the carpetbagger to an early close.

On March 4, 1877, Lamar entered the United States Senate and, reelected, he served until March 6, 1885, when President Grover Cleveland called him to his Cabinet as Secretary of the Interior, in which capacity he served with industry and fidelity until January 10, 1888, when he accepted, at the hands of the President, the appointment as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, where he served with distinction and great ability until his death, January 23, 1893.

Thus ended the career of a truly great man—a brave soldier, an unusual diplomat, a courageous champion of a lost cause, a great teacher of jurisprudence, a Congressman and Senator of fearless caliber, a member of Cabinet, and a great judge of a great tribunal. Indeed, Professor Whitfield stated a terse truth on January 24, 1893, when he moved to adjourn court "In honor of the greatest statesman of the South."

"His life was gentle,
And the elements so mixed in him,
That nature might stand up
And say to all the world,
'This was a man.'"

May this splendid portrait of a great Mississippian be a constant reminder to you and to generations yet unborn of a noble and unselfish life.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a distinguished member of the New York bar, Mr. John H. Hazelton, has prepared a brief relating to the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL RESPECTFULLY SUBMITTING TO THE SENATE OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THEIR CONSIDERATION A PROPOSED AMENDMENT (OF CONSTRUCTION) OF SECTION 2 OF ARTICLE XVIII OF THE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

To the Senate of the Congress of the United States:

I am neither a "wet" nor a "dry" (so-called); but I am, by birth, a citizen of the United States and much interested in its welfare.

May I not, therefore, respectfully submit the following:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE

"That section 2 of Article XVIII of the amendments should, and shall, be construed as a grant of concurrent power to both the Congress and the several States to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the entire prohibition of section 1 thereof; that the word 'concurrent' as there used means 'acting in union or conjunction' (that is, running with), and relates to the 'power' granted thereby, not to the 'legislation' power to enact merely, which is granted thereby."

Or the following:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE

"That section 2 of Article XVIII, of the amendments, should, and shall, be construed as a grant of concurrent power to both the Congress and the several States to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the entire prohibition of section 1 thereof; that the word 'concurrent,' as there used, means 'acting in union or conjunction' (that is, running with), and relates to the 'power' granted thereby, not to the 'legislation' power to enact merely, which is granted thereby."

For your consideration.

ARGUMENT

Leaving out of consideration an absolute repeal of the eighteenth amendment (which would, of course, end the "noble experiment" altogether) and leaving out of consideration, of course, the question of revenue, it seems to me that the real question underlying the present admittedly unsatisfactory prohibition situation is the enforcing of the amendment inside of the States.

And it seems to me that the real trouble is the erroneous construction (in National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350) of section 2 of the amendment, giving power to Congress inside of States—which section, it seems to me, was never properly presented to the court—the main contention in this case (it will be remembered) being that section 1 of the amendment, and, therefore, the entire amendment, was unconstitutional, which, of course, did not tend to any elaborate argument also on a question of construction of section 2, which conceded constitutionality.

It seems to me that a proper construction of section 2 would still leave the amendment (section 1) as a goal, but would leave the laws, if any, to enforce, inside of States (except in time of war and except in certain instances) to each State respectively—thus leaving these laws, if any, to enforce, inside of States, to grow in strength as the sentiment in the particular State grows, rather than attempting to enforce, inside of States, by laws of Congress, against the sentiment in the particular State.

It will, of course, be remembered that the Law Enforcement Commission found:

"1. The commission is opposed to repeal of the eighteenth amendment. * * *

"5. The commission is of opinion that the cooperation of the States is an essential element in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the national prohibition act throughout the territory of the United States; that the support of public opinion in the several States is necessary in order to insure such cooperation."

And this is exactly what would follow, it seems to me, if (merely) the words "concurrent power" in section 2 of the amendment were properly construed.

And the proper construction, it seems to me, is that given in (either of) the proposed amendments (of construction), these differing not at all in the (proposed) amendment proper but only in the method of ratification.

Article XVIII of the amendments says:

"SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

These words, "concurrent power," in section 2 are used to denote the kind of power in both "the Congress and the several States" to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, not the kind of power in each, it seems to me.

Looking first at this amendment by itself:

The first thing to note is that we can not (properly) construe this section 2 without reading into it the prohibition of section 1, "concurrent power to enforce" which "by appropriate legislation" is thus given.

(And looking at this section 1 we immediately see that the amendment is not confined to the States of the United States.)

The next thing to note is that this section 2 is but a single sentence; that the word "concurrent" is used but once; and that it applies equally to the power of both "the Congress and the several States" "to enforce this article by appropriate legislation," not to the power of each or either.

(And, thus noting, we see that we are not considering here at all the jurisdiction of a court, which passes upon the particular case only, but upon all the parties to it, if upon the case at all, but the power of legislation, which acts upon all persons subject to the particular power that legislates, of course, but which acts upon those persons only who are subject to that particular power of legislation.)

But, thus reading these sections together and thus noting, we see that we here have a very unusual situation—a "concurrent power" to enforce given to both "the Congress and the several States," which power to enforce (in its entirety) could be given to Congress alone, but which power to enforce (in its entirety) could not possibly be given to the several States alone, and therefore was not given to the several States at all (in its entirety).

In other words, the prohibition of section 1, it will be noted, extends throughout "the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof"; and there is territory in the United States, etc., over which not all of the States could possibly have any power.

And therefore, as the grant of power is of "concurrent power" to both "the Congress and the several States" "to enforce this article"—that is, to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1—it follows that we must construe the words, "concurrent power," having the same meaning as to both the Congress and the several States, it will be remembered, so far as "Congress" is concerned, just as (as stated) it must be construed as to "the several States," so that Congress has not power everywhere either.

In other words, the power, it will be noted, is in both "the Congress and the several States" and is "concurrent" to do the same thing, viz, to "enforce by appropriate legislation" the prohibition of section 1; and this prohibition extends beyond the States and could not, therefore, be enforced in its entirety by (all even of the) States and, therefore, was not intended to be enforced in its entirety by the Congress, because (as stated) the power in both is "concurrent," and whatever is this "concurrent power" in both, the "power" of each must be a power of which that each is capable before the power of both can be "concurrent power."

Our search, therefore, must be for that particular meaning of the word "concurrent" that permits this.

And with this in mind I assert without fear of proper contradiction that this word as here used clearly means that the Congress and the several States, both, "shall have * * * power," acting in union or conjunction (that is, "concurrent," or running with) "to enforce" section 1, not that either alone can enforce the entire section, but that both can ("shall have power" to) enforce the entire section, if both act in union or conjunction.

Or, to be more specific, the word "power" should be taken with the words "the Congress and the several States," (not with the words "the Congress" only, or with the words "the several States" only) showing that the power referred to is that of both, not of either or each; the word "concurrent" should be taken with the word "power," next to which it is, and not at all with the word "legislation"; and the words "concurrent power," not either only, but both, should be taken with the words "to enforce this article," showing that the power of both is that kind of power that is "concurrent" and that being "concurrent," would enable them both to enforce the entire prohibition that precedes, namely, the entire prohibition of section 1.

There is no getting away from this.

The meaning given, "acting in union or conjunction," is the only meaning of the word "concurrent" that can always be used with both the word "Congress" and the words "the several States" as applied to the power to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, which is what the section says.

To test this, all one has to do is to give to this word "concurrent" some other meaning than this "acting in union or conjunction" and see the difficulties that instantly result.

Take, for instance, the conclusions of the court itself in national prohibition cases. Among these conclusions are:

"8. The words 'concurrent power' in that section (sec. 2) do not mean joint power [correct], or require that legislation thereunder by Congress, to be effective, shall be approved or sanctioned by the several States or any of them [correct]; nor do they mean that the power to enforce is divided between Congress and the several States along the lines which separate or distinguish foreign and interstate commerce from intrastate affairs [incorrect].

"9. The power confided to Congress by that section, while not exclusive, is territorially coextensive with the prohibition of the first section [correct—but (except in time of war) it is not the same everywhere], embraces manufacture [correct—but (except in time of war) not manufacture, generally, inside of States] and other intrastate [correct only in the Army and the Navy and as to the business of the National Government and in time of war] transactions as well as importation, exportation, and interstate traffic [correct—but with certain limitations], and is in no wise dependent on or affected by action or inaction on the part of the several States or any of them [correct]."

In other words, they construed the section as if it read:

"The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation this article; the several States shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation so much of this article as comes within the several States; and—where both have power to enforce (all or any part of this article)—their powers shall be 'concurrent.'"

Which is not what the section says.

Take for instance the opinion of Chief Justice Taft in U. S. v. Lanza (260 U. S., 397).

It will be noted that—in States—he uses the word "concurrent" to mean "joint and equal in authority" but that—in territory not States—he (therefore, necessarily) disregards the word "concurrent" altogether.

As to the power of each (of the Congress and of the several States)—

Even after we have fixed, as we have, however, the "concurrent power" of both as concurrent power to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, there is still the question of what is the power of each (of the Congress and of the several States); and whether at all "concurrent," except as given, as the power of both is concurrent to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1.

If so, of course, it must be found otherwise in the amendment itself; or it must be found in the rest of the Constitution.

Here, therefore, we must look both at the amendment itself and at the rest of the Constitution.

But here we may start out with what we have already established:

The section itself does not say that the powers of each or of either are "concurrent."

The section itself deals merely with the powers of both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, and this power of both, it says, is "concurrent."

Therefore here, as to the power of each (of the Congress and of the several States), the first thing to note is, of course, that we must now reason just the reverse of our reasoning from the grant of power to both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1. We no longer must reason (as we have) that because the States can not enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, neither can Congress enforce the entire prohibition of section 1; but as neither, as we have seen, is given power to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, it follows that some part at least of the prohibition of section 1 is enforced only by either (the Congress or the several States), and that the power to enforce this part enforced by either, no matter by which, can not possibly be concurrent in any other sense than power concurrent in both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, which is what the amendment itself says.

And, this being determined, the question then is whether the power of either to enforce any of the prohibition of section 1 is a concurrent power in any other sense than power concurrent in both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1.

Certainly, from anything in section 2 itself, we are not to assume that either (each), in enforcing any part of the prohibition of section 1, has a concurrent power in any sense of the word except the one we have given as to the power of both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1, because that would be to assume that—notwithstanding the use of the word "concurrent," only once and in the sense we have shown, as applied to the power of both—it was intended (but not expressed) also that each should have concurrent power in another sense than the one expressed, which is hardly to be assumed.

Certainly, too, from anything in section 2 itself—as the word "concurrent" is used but once, and as applicable to the power of both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1—there is no presumption that the power of each or either is concurrent in any sense of the word except the one we have given as to the power of both to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1. Indeed, the presumption—under such circumstances—would be just the other way.

So that—all of this being so—it follows that we must answer this question also in the negative, unless we find something in the rest of the Constitution, as distinct from the section itself, to make us answer in the affirmative.

But here (in the rest of the Constitution) we are instantly met with "the supreme law of the land" provision of Article VI of the (original) Constitution—and thus find the question completely disposed of.

It follows from this "supreme" provision, of course, that—under the Constitution (also properly construed) as it stood before the amendment—there could not possibly be, at the same time, any concurrent power in Congress and the several States in any other sense of the word than the one we have given as to the power of both to enforce in its entirety such a prohibition as that in section 1; for—with such a provision in the Constitution as this "supreme" provision—there never could be any conflict of power between Congress and the several States.

Previous to this amendment without question.

Where Congress had power (of any kind) but the States had no power—for instance, in the District of Columbia, etc.—Congress only could act. Where Congress had exclusive power, the States being prohibited, Congress only could act. Where Congress had power, but not exclusive power, and the States also had power, the States could act until Congress acted, when the action of Congress became "supreme." Where the States had power, but Congress had no power—for instance, inside of States (except in the Army and in the Navy and as to business of the National Government, in States, and except in time of war)—the States only could act.

In other words, we immediately see that neither could declare, or act to enforce, any part of a prohibition such as the prohibition of section 1 that the other could declare, or act to enforce, at the same time.

But we immediately see also that both ("acting in union or conjunction") could have declared and enforced, if they had wanted to do so, a prohibition such as the entire prohibition of section 1, each a part.

That is, we immediately see that the entire prohibition of section 1 of the amendment is nothing more than a prohibition which "The Congress and the several States" themselves have always had concurrent power to make, but never made; and which the people of the United States, by an amendment, made.

And we immediately see that section 2 merely gives Congress and the several States the same "concurrent power" to enforce this prohibition made by the people themselves, by an amendment, that the Congress and the several States would have had to enforce such a prohibition if they themselves had (each so far as it had power without any amendment) declared such a prohibition.

And, seeing this, why should we look for any other meaning?

Certainly, what a provision is must indicate to some extent at least what the provision means?

Certainly, as section 2 itself indicates no change in the power of either (of the Congress or of the several States) as to enforcement, we should not assume a change in the power of either, as to enforcement.

Indeed, what was more natural than that in framing a provision for the enforcement of an entire prohibition it should be framed in words applicable to its entire enforcement, not applicable to its enforcement in part?

Indeed, does it not, therefore, thus, definitely appear that the people, in section 2 (merely), adopted, for the purposes of their amendment the powers they found already existing, as to the enforcement of prohibition, in the Congress and the several States, but without attempting (because not here necessary) to detail the powers of each?

In the language of the amendment itself:

"The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power [that is, shall have, acting in union or conjunction, power] to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Why, certainly, should we assume such an unnatural change as that Congress should have power also inside of States without its being said?

If such a change had been intended, surely it would have been expressly so stated.

Besides that, with such a construction as that for which I am contending, there is no conflict at any time between the United States and the States; the word "supreme" in Article VI continues to have its meaning as before (which it necessarily must have, unless changed for the purposes of this amendment by the use of "concurrent" in this amendment, for this is the only use of the word "concurrent" in either the original Constitution or in any of the amendments); and "devoutly to be wished"—there can be no double punishment by the United States and a State, because there can be no conflict.

And these are the results that naturally should be.

In other words, we should be construing Article XVIII of the amendments, even though it does use for the first time the words "concurrent power," harmoniously with the rest of the Constitution (so that not only this Article XVIII but everything else in the Constitution stands and has its due meaning) and that is the way the Constitution should naturally be construed.

The changes in the phraseology of the (proposed) amendment in Congress before the amendment passed Congress show that this is so, it seems to me. As first offered in the Senate the (proposed) amendment read:

"The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation, and nothing in this article shall deprive the several States of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

As it passed the Senate it read:

"The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The first of these, of course, would have given power to Congress everywhere (even in States) to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1; but it would have given no power to the States (in States) to enforce (any part of) the prohibition of section 1; that is, no power to enforce the amendment; but it would expressly have left unimpaired in the States their power previous thereto "to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

The second would have given power to Congress everywhere (even in States) to enforce the entire prohibition of section 1; but it would have given no power to the States (in States) to enforce (any part of) the prohibition of section 1; that is, no power to enforce the amendment; and it would have left the power already existing in the States without express comment.

And either would have resulted in untold litigation to construe.

JOHN H. HAZELTON.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1928.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask permission to withdraw the amendments to the bill remaining unadopted which I offered yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. HOWELL. And in lieu thereof I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "said board" and to insert in lieu thereof "the Secretary of the Treasury."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "said board" and to insert in lieu thereof "the Secretary of the Treasury."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, beginning in line 14, after the period, it is proposed to strike out all of lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, as follows:

On and after July 1 next following the passage of this title, a customs duty of 4 cents per pound shall be levied, collected, and paid on all cotton imported into the United States or Puerto Rico in the same manner as other customs duties are levied, collected, and paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Nebraska to explain what he is seeking to accomplish by that amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. The words proposed to be stricken out provide for raising revenue and are not properly in a bill originating in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite aside, Mr. President, from the criticisms of Title III in the pending bill with respect to its operation, I can not think there can be any serious doubt in the mind of any lawyer here that the provision of the bill which makes it punishable as a crime to buy commodities falling under the operation of the bill except at a price fixed by the board violates the most fundamental constitutional principle. I can not think that question is a debatable one at all. Two parties enter into an agreement, the one to buy and the other to sell, at a price that is mutually agreeable, a commodity which is not only innocuous in every particular but which is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of life, for instance, in the case of wheat. Such a transaction is denounced by the bill and made penal. I trust that no hopes will be entertained by anybody that a bill of which such a provision is the central fundamental feature can withstand attack upon the ground that it is void under the Constitution.

This part of the bill is denominated, Mr. President, the allotment plan, although I see nothing in the provisions which justify the title by which it is named. On May 25 last the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] had inserted in the RECORD an article telling about a real allotment plan by which the amount of a particular commodity brought under the operation of the act should be allotted among the various producers of that particular commodity. Having referred to the bill as it is now before the Senate, the Senator from South Dakota said:

Mr. President, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD an explanation of another domestic allotment plan, by W. R. Ronald, of Mitchell, S. Dak., publisher of the Mitchell Republican. Mr. Ronald is a member of a committee of five appointed at a recent meeting held at Chicago whose purpose it is to bring before the public the merits of this plan.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT PLAN

"W. R. Ronald, of Mitchell, S. Dak., member of a committee chosen at a Chicago conference to promote the domestic allotment plan to make the tariff effective on farm products of which there is an exportable surplus, spoke as follows at a luncheon attended by various Members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"'The idea of the domestic allotment plan was first suggested by the late Doctor Spillman, of the United States Department of Agriculture, in 1926. In 1929 Prof. John D. Black, of Harvard University, who is also chief economist of the Federal Farm Board, wrote in his collegiate capacity a book entitled "Agricultural Reform in the United States," in which he devoted a chapter to the allotment plan of making the tariff effective on home consumption of farm products of which there is an exportable surplus. He developed the idea considerably from the form in which Doctor Spillman presented it.

"'In the past two years Prof. M. L. Wilson, head of the department of agricultural economics of the Montana State College, Bozeman, Mont., made some 50 addresses to meetings of farmers, at each of which he explained the four different plans of making the tariff work for the farmer or, at least, improve domestic prices—stabilization, the equalization fee, the export debenture, and the allotment plan. He attempted to make no case for any of them, but in each meeting the farmers declared emphatically for the allotment plan. As a result, the Montana State Farm Bureau at its last meeting indorsed the proposal.

"'In consequence of this, Vice President Stockton, of the Montana State Farm Bureau, invited a number of those who had become interested in the plan to attend a conference at Chicago to discuss it. This group indorsed the principles of the plan and named a committee composed of M. L. Wilson, chairman; E. H. Harriman, of Boston, Mass. (newly elected president of the United States Chamber of Commerce); Louis S. Clark, of Omaha, president of the Mortgage Investors' Association of Nebraska; Henry A. Wallace, editor of Wallace's Farmer, of Des Moines, Iowa; R. R. Rogers, of Newark, N. J.; and W. R. Ronald, editor of the Mitchell (S. Dak.) Evening Republican, and instructed the committee to complete a bill for introduction into Congress. Following this, Mr. Wilson spent some two weeks in Washington and New York and presented the plan to a considerable number who have opposed all other farm price measures, including some high in official and business life, and found general approval of the plan for the reason that, unlike all others, it prevents any increase in acreage or production of products benefited but actually makes possible positive reduction of them when found desirable.'"

The remainder of the article appears in the RECORD of May 25 at page 11144.

This plan, Mr. President, proposes, as the bill before us does, that there shall be made by the Department of Agriculture an estimate of the amount of the annual production, an estimate of the amount necessary for domestic consumption, and an estimate of the amount that will go into the export trade. That amount then is allotted to the various States in proportion to their average production for the past period of five years. Then an organization within the State apportions the amount which may be produced in each county in the same way on a basis of the average for the past five years. The county organization then allots the amount to the various producers. There is nothing forced about it at all. Then the processors of the product—that is, the millers or others—will pay into the Treasury of the United States on each unit purchased an amount equal to the duty upon that particular commodity. The allottees are then requested to sign a contract by which they agree to sow no more acreage than that which is fixed by the Farm Board; that is, allotted by the Farm Board. They may sign or not, as they please; but if they sign, they then become entitled to share in the fund which is thus accumulated in the Treasury. If they do not sign, they do not share. In a general way, those are the features of the plan.

It was elaborated by Professor Wilson, who, I may say, stands high in the Nation as an authority upon agricultural questions, before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives 10 days ago. As a result of his elucidation of the plan before that body, Representative FULMER was directed to introduce a bill embodying the plan. It is House bill 12461. I introduced in this body a duplicate of the bill, being Senate bill 4859.

It was my purpose, Mr. President, to offer this bill as a substitute for Title III of the bill now under consideration; but the purpose of the plan is to make effective to the agricultural industry the paper duties upon agricultural products, duties which are really of no significance, so far as returns to the farmers are concerned; but, there being no duty upon short-staple cotton, the bill would have to make provision, and it does make provision, for a duty of 5 cents per pound upon short-staple cotton; and that, of course, makes the bill of such character as that it can not originate in this House. So it would be subject to a point of order and could not be considered in connection with the pending measure, and perhaps it would be inadvisable to send the bill to the House with such a provision in it. I speak of it, however, in the hope that the bill will have some consideration by the Members of this body and in the hope that Members of the House will give it consideration in connection with this bill later on.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will yield in a moment. The important thing about this bill is that, although it offers a very much greater return to the producer, it can not result in an increase in the production, because that is always under the control of the Farm Board. They may limit production; that is to say, they fix the amount, and the producer will get returns only upon that part which is consumed in the domestic trade, and the remainder he must dispose of as he can. Accordingly, he will not get such a return as will make it advisable for him to extend his acreage to any considerable extent. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the provision in the pending bill known as the allotment plan provides only for cost of production on the amount used for home consumption here in the United States. Under the plan of which the Senator from Montana speaks, known as the Wilson plan, the amount to be paid to the farmer is based on the amount of the tariff on those products, which would not give, under present conditions, the cost of production to practically any of the commodities produced in the United States to-day. Unless we can have a tariff such as France has, such as Germany has, such as Italy has on farm products, that gives the farmers cost of production when that tariff is made effective, a plan such as the Senator suggests would be of little value to our farmers in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are we to understand from the Senator from North Dakota that he expects that under the plan found in this bill the price of wheat for domestic consumption, for instance, would be greater than 42 cents a bushel above the world price?

Mr. FRAZIER. It would have to be if it gives the farmer the cost of production under present circumstances.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that the Senator is looking, under the bill before us, for a price of wheat for domestic consumption greater than 42 cents a bushel in advance of the world price?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, 42 cents over the world price at the present time does not give cost of production. This bill is based on cost of production.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whether it does or not, that is what the Senator is looking for?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly. Unless the farmer gets cost of production for his product, he can not get along. He can not make a success of his farming any more than any business man on earth can make a success of his business unless he gets cost of production.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator's hopes are high.

Mr. FRAZIER. Unless that can be done, Mr. President, the farmer of the United States has no hope at all. He will be put down and out, as he is going and has been going for the past year.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The debenture plan provides, my recollection is, for one-half of the tariff.

Mr. FRAZIER. Does the Senator think that would give the farmer cost of production under the present circumstances?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not talking about that. I was talking about what you can get. If you could get anything like 42 cents a bushel for your wheat over and above the world price, you ought to feel extremely happy about it. I am sure the farmers of Montana would.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am sure it would not do the farmers of Montana any good if it gives them only half the cost of production. They would go broke just the same as they are going broke now. It would merely delay the agony a little longer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not desire to discuss the matter any further, Mr. President. I submit this matter for the consideration of the Senators in lieu of a proposition that I think everybody who reflects upon at all, who knows anything about constitutional principles, will be convinced is perfectly hopeless, and that you are holding out the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope to these people who have been a long time awaiting some relief.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1768. An act to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va.;

S. 3929. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close certain alleys and to set aside land owned by the District of Columbia for alley purposes;

S. 4106. An act to provide for the closing of certain streets and alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 4396. An act to provide for readjustment of street lines and the transfer of land for school, park, and highway purposes, in the northeast section of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 4689. An act to authorize the closing of certain streets in the District of Columbia rendered useless or unnecessary, and for other purposes; and

S. 4736. An act to authorize the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. to extend its present track connection with the United States navy yard so as to provide adequate railroad facilities in connection with the development of Buzzards Point as an industrial area in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words about the bill generally. It has been amended so many times that it is quite difficult to understand what it now provides, because, for the most part, the amendments offered and accepted were not printed. But, referring to the equalization-fee provision of the bill, or Title I, at page 8, we find this provision:

> Under such regulations as the board may prescribe the equalization fee determined under this section for any agricultural commodity produced in the United States shall in addition be collected upon the importation of each designated unit of the agricultural commodity imported into the United States for consumption therein, and an equalization fee, in an amount equivalent as nearly as may be, shall be collected upon the importation of any food product derived in whole or in part from the agricultural commodity and imported into the United States for consumption therein.

I dare say that it can not be contended by anyone that that is not a tariff provision, a wide and sweeping tariff, not only upon the agricultural commodity but upon any food product into which the agricultural commodity enters, in whole or in part, when imported into the United States.

Then, going to the debenture provision of this bill, it will be noted that on page 14 it is provided that—

> The debenture rate in effect at any time with respect to any manufactured product of any debenturable commodity shall be an amount sufficient as nearly as may be, to equal the debenture that would be issuable upon the exportation of the quantity of the debenturable commodity used or consumed in the manufacture of the exported manufactured product, as prescribed and promulgated from time to time by said board.

And in subsection (b), there is an express provision for a customs duty of 4 cents per pound on cotton, to be collected and paid on all cotton imported into the United States or Puerto Rico in the same manner as other customs duties are levied, collected, and paid.

Mr. HOWELL and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and to whom?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. I call attention to the fact that an amendment has just been adopted by the Senate striking out that provision.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to learn that, because that is in plain terms, of course, a tariff duty which the Senate, at least, would have no power to originate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To make clear what has just been stated, under the present law there is a tariff duty of 7 cents per pound on long-staple cotton; and until the remark just made by the Senator from Nebraska I was curious to be advised as to whether or no, if that provision remained in the bill, it would impliedly amend the existing law in respect to the tariff on cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly that would be true. The Senator from Nebraska now advises us that the provision is taken out of the bill, however.

Now going to the allotment plan, on page 18, subsection 1, at the bottom of the page, we find this provision:

> To the end that the policy declared in this act may be effectuated, the Federal Farm Board is authorized, whenever it finds that the importation into the United States of any such agricultural products or their substitutes produced outside of the United States materially affects or is likely to materially affect the sale in the domestic market of any such agricultural products at a price not less than the cost of production, to proclaim that fact; and thereafter it shall be unlawful to import, directly or indirectly, any such products or their substitutes into the United States.

That, of course, is an embargo. There is no attempt to disguise it.

Then follows, in subsection (2) on page 19, the remarkable provision which the Senator from Montana has already brought to our attention with reference to the sale of farm products in the United States by the producers thereof:

> It shall be unlawful for any licensee to purchase any agricultural products at a price less than the cost of production proclaimed by the Federal Farm Board.

And in subdivision (3):

> Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, intentionally or knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required pursuant to this section, or intentionally or knowingly makes any purchase in violation hereof, and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both.

Now, Mr. President, aside from the fact that we have in each one of the titles in this bill provision for tariffs—except, perhaps, the debenture title, from which it has been stricken—we have provision in this bill for tariffs to be levied by the Federal Farm Board almost at its discretion, upon the mere finding that it is not able to carry out the original purposes of the farm marketing act. It is a most extraordinary attempt to vest in the Farm Board the power to impose tariffs, to determine the amount of the tariffs, and the power to issue embargoes.

Even if it were constitutional—and I do not think anyone could imagine that the Congress, wherever the bill originated, could give to the Farm Board the extraordinary power to fix tariffs and to impose embargoes sought to be conferred upon the board in this bill—it seems to me that the Congress would certainly never give such power as this to the Farm Board or to any other agency of government.

I dare say that agriculture could not live under this bill if it were put into operation. If it were actually carried into execution for 12 months, it would destroy any industry to which applied. Arbitrary power such as is given in this bill over a great industry like agriculture seems to offend every accepted principle. It seems to be offensive to sound principle, to general principles recognized by the hornbook.

The purpose of the bill, of course, is to do something for agriculture; but, in my judgment, we can do much harm to agriculture by giving the Farm Board such broad power as is given here, even if we could, under the Constitution, confer such power.

I invite attention again to this particular provision in the allotment plan:

> The Federal Farm Board is authorized, whenever it finds that the importation into the United States of any such agricultural products or their substitutes produced outside of the United States materially affects or is likely to materially affect the sale in the domestic market of any such agricultural products at a price not less than the cost of production, to proclaim that fact; and thereafter it shall be unlawful to import, directly or indirectly, any such products or their substitutes into the United States.

Loosely, the Farm Board is given the power to determine whether importations of an agricultural product or a substitute will actually affect or are likely to affect the sale in the domestic market of any such agricultural product at the price fixed by the board. Then the board is to have the power to issue an embargo.

Mr. President, yesterday some facts were brought to the attention of the Senate.. I want to emphasize them, in full sympathy with the general spirit and purpose of the bill, but nevertheless I wish to emphasize them.

The allotment provision in this bill is clearly void. It could not be sustained anywhere, and I dare say that no one would seriously attempt to sustain it after he has thought about it. It is not an attempt to regulate farm products entering into interstate and foreign commerce. The only jurisdiction we have is to regulate the product that enters into interstate and foreign commerce. All that is attempted with respect to a farm product in interstate and foreign commerce is to say that it must be exported. It must be separated or segregated and withheld from the market. What is undertaken to be done is to regulate that part of the product which enters into domestic commerce; and there is not a suggestion that State lines have anything whatsoever to do with the general scheme and purpose of this bill. There is no attempt to regulate agricultural products in interstate commerce. The whole scheme is this, as I gathered yesterday from the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], that if one is engaged in cotton raising, and produces in a given year 20 bales of cotton, one-half of that cotton, in the discretion of the Farm Board, must be sold in the domestic market at the price fixed by the board, the other one-half must be exported, or must be withheld from the market, must be taken off the market, and can not be sold in the domestic market at all.

It was yesterday pointed out that the cotton producer does not carry his cotton to market at one time. He produces his cotton and usually carries it from the gin to the market daily as he gins it.

It was suggested here that each bale should be sold, one half of it at the domestic price fixed by the board, the other half at the world price. How can you compel anyone to buy the cotton? How could you induce any cotton buyer to buy a bale of cotton and to pay for 250 pounds of the cotton, let us say, 15 cents a pound, the amount fixed by the Farm Board, and pay for the other one-half of the cotton, or 250 pounds, at the present world price, something like 4 cents a pound, let us say, in the primary market? What could a buyer do with it? The buyer could not do anything but export it or segregate it and withhold it from the market. If he is not an exporter he could not handle it.

There would be no practicable way to sell a bale of cotton under this bill. It would be impossible for the farmer to dispose of it, because the purchaser would be required to segregate half of one bale of cotton. If he were buying only one bale of cotton, or if he were buying a hundred bales of cotton, the principle would be the same. He could not segregate it, he could not separate it, he could not put half of it into domestic consumption and hold the other half at the will or wish of the Farm Board. Cotton fluctuates from day to day.

Let us go a step farther. The farmer is producing cotton, let us say, in a given county. Within sight of his field is a factory. The factory buys the raw products of that county, manufactures them into finished products, and sells the finished goods within the State. There is no warrant, of course, under the Constitution to say to the man who produces, and the man who buys, and the man who sells, and to the men and women and children who consume within the county, wholly within the State, that they must comply with the regulations and restrictions of this particular allotment plan.

Let us see what would happen. Here is a mill which desires cotton. The mill undertakes to buy the cotton from the producer, but the mill buys only the cotton which has been marked for domestic consumption at the price fixed by the Federal Farm Board. The mill receives the cotton, manufactures it into cloth, or into yarn, or what not, and then it discovers that it can not sell its manufactured product in the domestic market. What is it to do? It has paid for the cotton the higher price fixed by the board, or 15 cents a pound, on the assumption that it would use the cotton for domestic purposes, and in good faith it intended to use it to supply the domestic demand, but after having manufactured the cotton into cloth, it finds that it has no market anywhere in the United States and must export it, and must export the cloth for which it paid the high American price and, of course, receive whatever it may receive in the world market.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I recognize the validity of the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I want to call his attention to the fact, however, that his picture of what would happen is just exactly what the cotton goods manufacturer does to-day. He buys cotton; he then has to find a market for it; and if he can not find a market for it in the United States, he has to export it. That would be the situation he would be in under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, of course if he can not find a market he must export; but he has bought his cotton both to supply the domestic demand and the foreign demand, and at precisely the same price, and is placed at no disadvantage.

What I am trying to say to the Senate is that one could not sell a bale of cotton under this bill. Nobody would buy the cotton. The mill could not buy it, the factor could not buy it, for the reasons indicated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. There might be some objection raised if there were just one bale of cotton produced and sold; but that is not the fact, of course. If it were 50 per cent for home consumption and 50 per cent for export, the licensed buyer could pay for half the cotton the farmer brings in the domestic price fixed by the board, and for the other half the world price, as determined, and the exporter would pay that world price, would buy at that world price, or it could be put in storage if the buyer wanted to do so. I do not think there is anything to quibble over in regard to that at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not quibbling over it, but if the Senator were engaged in cotton farming and marketing, and knew the cotton business, he would know that under this bill he could not sell his cotton, because no one, generally, would buy. The farmer himself can not foreknow, when he begins to gather his cotton, how much he is going to make. He can not take two bales and say, "This one is for the domestic consumption, and this other one for the export trade," because he can not foreknow what his total crop will be. He has to deal with it as he gets it day by day to the market.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Take the case of a tenant farmer, and probably most of the cotton is raised by tenant farmers. Suppose he raises 15 bales of cotton; before he raises that cotton he has borrowed the money with which to produce it, and owes nine-tenths of the value of the cotton after it is raised. What would be the effect of this measure on cotton raised that way? Could the man sell it all to his merchant, or just what would happen? The Senator from Georgia knows, as I know, and as every other Senator from the South where cotton is raised knows, that probably half of the cotton is raised by tenant farmers, and they all have to mortgage their crops in order to get the money with which to produce the crops. How could such a man get along at all, and how could a merchant get his pay under the terms of this bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think he could if the Senator assumes that the terms of the bill are valid and enforceable. But even getting over that hurdle, and having produced the cotton, one who did produce it and who was seeking to dispose of it could not dispose of it to the buyer or to the mill, because whatever may have been the original purpose, every mill man knows that he would probably find it necessary to dispose of his manufactured products in the foreign market, if he disposes of them at all, and therefore you would wholly destroy the market for cotton.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. This bill is intended to give the farmer, the producer, the cost of production for the amount of his product used in home consumption. Would it not be better for the cotton farmer, even if he has to take, say, 10 cents, if that was the cost of production, for his half of the cotton, than it would be to get 10 cents for half of it and 4 cents for the other half? Would not that put him in position to pay his debts a great deal better than if he received the world price for all of it?

Mr. GEORGE. I fully agree with the Senator that it would be better if the farmer got anything, but he would not get anything for his cotton. He would have to go out of the cotton business if this bill should become law and was enforced. Generally he would not be able to sell it at all.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, under this measure the buyer would be licensed.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. And he would be compelled, under the law, to pay the cost of production as fixed by the board for a percentage of each farmer's production, based on cost of production.

Mr. GEORGE. Who would be compelled to buy it?

Mr. FRAZIER. The licensed buyer would be compelled to buy it or lose his license to buy.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the chief weakness of the measure, as I see it; its framers have not found anybody to whom they can say, "You must buy this cotton at the price we fix." That is a defect in the scheme.

Mr. FRAZIER. The measure provides that no one can buy cotton or other products as a business unless he is licensed.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. FRAZIER. And an embargo would be placed against importing any of a given product at a price below cost of production. Then no cotton would be sold and no cotton would be bought unless it were bought through these licensed buyers.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but buyers would not want a license. They would go out of business as quickly as they could get out. You can not make anybody buy cotton.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course not. You could compel them to go out of business, though, if they did not comply with the law and buy under the regulations.

Mr. GEORGE. That is what would result.

Mr. FRAZIER. And then some one else would go into the business.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the entire market would be gone.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; we would have to have cotton, with these regulations, just the same as we do now, for our factories and mills, and they would pay cost of production for the amount used for home consumption. That would be all the difference.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish the Senator's idea could be actually translated into law; but as a practical man, who has spent most of his life in the cotton fields, I am decidedly disposed to doubt that we could make this law work at all.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator from Georgia would be willing, then, to strike cotton from this bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I certainly would be delighted to have it stricken out of the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. As far as I am concerned, my interests are with the people of the North, who raise wheat, and I am not concerned with cotton any more than to see that the people who raise cotton get cost of production for at least the part that is used in home consumption.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not discussing the wheat problem, because I do not know much about it, but I am discussing the cotton problem.

May I call the Senator's attention to this language in the allotment plan?—

> Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board.

That is, the price for the portion that is found to be necessary for home consumption.

> The remaining—

Now we are dealing with 60 per cent of the cotton—

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

That sentence alone would make it impossible to sell a single bale of cotton in ordinary course of trade.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is really no occasion for striking cotton out of the provisions of this bill, because it could not possibly fall under them. The first subdivision of section 14, at the bottom of page 18, reads:

> To the end that the policy declared in this act may be effectuated, the Federal Farm Board is authorized, whenever it finds that the importation into the United States of any such agricultural products or their substitutes produced outside of the United States materially affects or is likely to materially affect the sale in the domestic market of any such agricultural products at a price not less than the cost of production—

Then it proclaims that fact.

Inasmuch as no cotton is imported into the United States, of course, the importations can not possibly affect the domestic price, and therefore the board never could proclaim such a condition as that.

I do not care to get into the cotton end of this matter, but I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from North Dakota to the same situation with respect to wheat.

The price of wheat in the United States is but very slightly affected, if it is affected at all, by importations of wheat from other countries. That is not what bears down the price of wheat. It certainly is not reduced below the cost of production by reason of the importations of wheat from abroad. I submit to the Senator from North Dakota particularly that he has the bill in such shape that wheat can not possibly come under the operation of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Montana that he is mistaken about the cotton not being imported into this country. My recollection is that in 1930 or 1931, I have forgotten which, there were 300,000 bales of Egyptian cotton imported into this country. In the Mississippi Valley and also in the Imperial Valley, and I think on some of the islands along the Atlantic coast, long-staple cotton is raised which comes in direct competition with the Egyptian cotton which is imported into this country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not speaking about long-staple cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was speaking only about short-staple cotton?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think there is any short-staple cotton imported.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When we spoke about cotton I took for granted we spoke about short-staple cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I assume, of course, the American mills import some short staple, the long length short staple. Our mills or buyers have on occasion imported short-staple cotton for the purpose, no doubt, of controlling the market.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Several times the Senator has said with reference to cotton that under the bill not a bale of cotton could be sold. I wonder if the Senator means under the bill? Was he not referring particularly to Title III?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I was referring to the allotment plan.

Mr. NORRIS. His remarks might be misleading. I am not finding fault with the Senator, but there are three methods provided in the bill and he is speaking of Title III, which is called the allotment plan.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; exclusively.

Mr. NORRIS. The remarks of the Senator would not apply to the debenture plan.

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all. The only thing I said about the debenture plan was with reference to the provision for a tariff, which I am advised has been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember the Senator was talking about it and somebody interrupted me and I was not able to follow his statement through. What was that provision in the debenture plan?

Mr. GEORGE. It is found on page 15, beginning in line 14, as follows:

> On and after July 1 next following the passage of this title, a customs duty of 4 cents per pound shall be levied, collected, and paid on all cotton imported into the United States or Porto Rico in the same manner as other customs duties are levied, collected, and paid.

I am advised that that has been stricken out of the bill by amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Will the Senator look on page 8, which is the equalization-fee portion of the bill, commencing with line 14 and running down to the end of line 23? Does the Senator remember whether that language was in the so-called McNary-Haugen bill which we passed through the Senate on two or three different occasions?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not recall.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that that is levying a tariff straight out. I do not see the necessity for it here. Certainly under the Constitution, it seems to me, it would vitiate that part of the bill, because we have no authority under the Constitution to initiate a revenue measure.

Mr. GEORGE. That was my comment upon that particular provision. Of course, if we attached it to a revenue bill, it would be a different thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to take this occasion to say that it seems to me to be essential, in any proper operation of the debenture plan or the equalization-fee plan, to impose tariffs upon importations and reimportations of farm products. That must necessarily be done.

Mr. NORRIS. That could not apply where there is to be a tariff imposed.

Mr. GEORGE. No; nor where there is a tariff already in existence.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if we wanted to adopt a plan putting some commodity on the free list in order to make it effective, we would either have to impose a tariff or resort to the method proposed in the debenture plan by making a straight levy on the product.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true.

Mr. President, I merely wished to offer these comments upon the bill generally. I do not wish to be understood as saying that any allotment plan would be subject to the criticisms which I have suggested. It occurs to me that an allotment plan might be worked out which would be free of the objections, but I am speaking of the allotment plan in this particular measure. Notwithstanding the admirable purposes of the author of the bill and of those who are championing it on the floor, and notwithstanding the extreme urgency for relief to agriculture, I do not see how the allotment plan here presented could be made applicable to the cotton industry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel that some serious objections have been raised to the bill. It illustrates, it seems to me, the dangers in the pathway which the Senate has been traveling now for a month or six weeks. We are undertaking, it seems to me, to do some impossibilities. In the anxiety of Senators to adjourn and in the anxiety of Senators to enact some relief for agriculture, I am afraid we are trying to do things that we would not undertake if we were more deliberate. I think it is true of every Senator—and I am speaking now only from my own experience, though I do not believe I am an exception to the general rule—that there has not been a session of Congress in the last 40 years when the work of Congress has accumulated and piled up in front of Senators as is the case at the present time. We have been working almost day and night. I know from my own experience it has become impossible for me to give individual attention to a great many things in which I have a deep interest.

I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and have been ever since I have been in the Senate. As Senators know, for a long time I was chairman of that committee. I devoted most all of my time to the consideration of matters coming before that committee. While I was chairman and afterwards, when I was able and was not crowded with the work with which I am now crowded, I tried to attend all the meetings of the committee. I became familiar during that time with, I think, nearly every known proposal for the relief of agriculture. I have read hundreds of the plans. I have listened for weeks and weeks to discussion of them by scientific men who have been instrumental in drawing them, down through the list to and including men who talked most and knew nothing whatever about them. I felt, therefore, sufficiently familiar with the debenture plan and with the equalization-fee plan to vote on them intelligently. When I knew they were the same that we had passed through the Senate previously, I did not consider it necessary to give my attention to them.

That is not true, however, of the allotment plan. I am not sure but that an allotment plan may be worked out to be the best of any plan proposed. I do not believe it is worked out in this bill. I could satisfy myself in voting for the bill, however, because none of the plans is mandatory. It is not at all likely that the Farm Board, if the bill should become a law, would ever put more than one of the plans into effect. I take it that they would not put the allotment plan into effect at all as we have it in this bill. It seems to me there are at present some very objectionable features that would have to be worked out. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has called attention to one. I think there are others in the bill. In voting for it I do not want it understood that I am giving my approval to the allotment plan as it is set forth in the bill. Neither do I want it to be understood from what I say that I am condemning the allotment plan.

A great deal of attention has been given the allotment plan by very eminent students of the subject. I never gave it any study to amount to anything until recently. I am afraid that the provisions of the bill with regard to the allotment plan as set forth in the bill are unworkable. If we pass the bill I would like to have my vote explained to that effect, not because I condemn it. If we had more time, if we could consider these things as we have in the past, we probably could work out a plan that would be satisfactory and that would be workable.

On page 8, commencing with line 14 and ending with line 23, we find this language—and this is the part of the bill that applies to the equalization fee:

> Under such regulations as the board may prescribe, the equalization fee determined under this section for any agricultural commodity produced in the United States shall in addition be collected upon the importation of each designated unit of the agricultural commodity imported into the United States for consumption therein, and an equalization fee, in an amount equivalent as nearly as may be, shall be collected upon the importation of any food product derived in whole or in part from the agricultural commodity and imported into the United States for consumption therein.

Mr. President, I can not myself see why that is not a straight imposition of a tariff duty upon a large number of products. It is not incidentally there. It comes directly. As we all know, under the Constitution we have no authority to initiate revenue legislation. That would be all right if we had a bill from the House proposing to raise revenue and we were to offer that provision as an amendment. It would be perfectly proper because the Constitution provides that while we are prohibited from initiating in the Senate revenue-raising legislation, yet it is specifically stated that we have authority to offer amendments as we may see fit to House bills dealing with that subject.

I do not believe that language is contained in the equalization-fee plan that we have passed through the Senate at different times and which originated in the Senate, although I have not had time to look it up to see whether that is true or not. However, I have no fear of the court declaring the entire act unconstitutional simply because in one or the other of the plans there is something that makes that plan unconstitutional. To be wise, however, on that subject it seems to me we ought to add an amendment to the bill providing that if the court finds any title or any provision or any part of the act unconstitutional it shall not affect any other part.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I may say that the Senator's colleague, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], has such an amendment prepared and ready to offer.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask my colleague if he took that language from the injunction bill which we passed recently?

Mr. HOWELL. No; it was prepared by the legislative bureau.

Mr. NORRIS. They have probably used that form. We adopted a little different plan after a good deal of discussion in the Judiciary Committee on the injunction bill, and it has been used since in a number of bills and copied a great deal. I think it is a much better provision than we used to put on our bills. However, even without that provision I think it is the duty in a general way of a court, in passing on the constitutionality of an act of Congress, if it finds that the unconstitutional part of it is not the main object in passing a bill and that the balance of it can stand as a concrete proposition without the unconstitutional part, not to declare the entire act unconstitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator just stated the question as I think it is pretty well established by the courts, that if any particular provision may be regarded as unconstitutional, they will leave intact the workable provisions, and of course will eliminate the unconstitutional part.

Mr. NORRIS. And let the remainder stand. I think that is good constitutional law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the views of the Senator as to what effect the elimination of the tariff provision would have upon the effectiveness of the bill in increasing the prices of commodities.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if it left the bill rather unworkable, it could go to the House, where the defect could be remedied, as they have the constitutional power to act in that way; but I would rather strike the tariff provision out than run the risk of having the court hold this whole title unconstitutional on account of that provision originating in the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The point on which I should like to have the Senator's views is if we do not have a tariff provision in the bill to protect importations, would importations then prevent the accomplishment of the purpose to increase the value of the commodities proposed to be benefited under the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would depend upon whether or not the particular articles when imported had tariffs on them. In other words, if they had tariffs sufficiently high to keep them out, it would be all right; but if they had no tariffs on them, then the equalization fee would not work. The equalization fee is intended to put the producers of commodities included in or operated upon by the bill on an equality with others who are manufacturing articles or dealing in articles which are protected by a tariff. It is designed to give the producer the benefit of the tariff. It has no other object, so far as I know, and never had any. That was the real object of the bill. It is quite a long bill, because when you come to work out a proposal of that kind it is a very complicated affair. I myself have always doubted whether the equalization fee, on account of its complexities, would be workable as to some commodities. I think it would work as to wheat and corn and cotton, but I do not have much faith in it working as to some other commodities that are manufactured or partially so. So the operation of the equalization fee without a tariff is an impossibility; it simply has no reason for existence, because its only object is to make a tariff effective, as we usually say, to agriculture.

Mr. President, I myself feel warranted at least in voting for this bill, because, even if some of the objections should be held to be good, there would still be left in the bill, in my judgment, intact sufficient to make it workable. I do not have any doubt, as I look at it, but that the simplest proposition that has ever been devised for aiding agriculture is the debenture plan. It is objected to by some because it is said that it is a bonus, and indirectly it is. That objection does not apply to the equalization fee, because the producer of a commodity stands the loss, but it is certainly simple, and it certainly stands intact in this bill if the other objections are held to be good.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

> On and after July 1 next following the passage of this title, a customs duty of 4 cents per pound shall be levied, collected, and paid on all cotton imported into the United States or Puerto Rico in the same manner as other customs duties are levied, collected, and paid.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with the adoption of the amendment, but, after action upon it, if nobody else desires to discuss the bill I should like to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Idaho desires to discuss the bill, I should like to proceed for a few moments.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho desires to offer an amendment, which he understands is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "joint resolution" and insert in lieu thereof "act."

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I hope I may be pardoned for detaining the Senate for a few moments to offer a brief individual comment on the significance of this measure and its implications so far as American agriculture is concerned.

As the Senator from Nebraska has just stated, the avowed purpose of the equalization fee provision is to attempt to lift the prices of agricultural commodities up to the artificial tariff level occupied by manufactured commodities which are able to avail themselves, more or less, of the tariff benefits.

Mr. President, I think we should thoroughly understand, as we go along, just what we are attempting to do and just what the fundamentals of this economic situation are. This measure puts the spokesmen for the farmer, who are supporting it, in the Senate and the farm leaders of the country, who are sponsoring it, in the position of acquiescing in the present and the recent tariff policy of our country as exemplified by the Fordney and the Smoot-Hawley laws. In other words, Mr. President, the farm spokesmen are saying to the farmers of the Nation that the Mellon-Grundy idea of tariffs should be the permanent and fixed policy of this country and that the farmers and their spokesmen should acquiesce in it without complaint and without any serious effort at any time to mitigate the more extreme provisions it contains. The farm spokesmen are saying in effect to the farmer back home that we have practically an embargo tariff policy so far as it being remotely competitive is concerned; that it is written by the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries so far as the lion's share of the benefits is concerned; that it is the duty of the farmers of the country to acquiesce in the economic and tariff and commercial leadership of this the most extreme type of the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries. Let them write their own high rates and, of course, give the farmers the fullest opportunity also to write high rates, which in most instances are merely paper rates. The farmer then is expected to trudge along behind the chariot wheels of the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries of the country, who are able to get a substantial per cent of the tariff benefits while the farmer gets but little. The farmers' representatives then attempt to construct a scaffold, which may be a very temporary and crude one, but which will afford the only medium by which we may hope that the farmer will get a few of the tariff crumbs that fall from the table of the industrial beneficiaries in this country, whom I have described.

I am not criticizing them. So long as the American farmers will sit still and through their Representatives and Senators acquiesce in Mr. Grundy and Mr. Mellon and men of that type writing our tariff laws and take in return nothing but paper rates for the farmer except as to some minor specialties, of course, the farmers are going on toward economic perdition; and that is the situation in this country.

I want to assert, Mr. President, that if the American farmers instead of this course of supine acquiescence would organize themselves, they could in 48 hours deadlock the Government and compel the consideration of economic policies that would be fair to them instead of allowing policies dictated by the industrial group to become the sole matters of consideration.

There is little wonder that American agriculture is steadily on the decline. I have here the figures of the decline of farm values from 1922, when the Fordney-McCumber bill was enacted, which created two price levels, one for agriculture and one for industry. Farm values have decreased every single year from 1922 down to 1930. If we take as the average value that for 1912 to 1914 and figure it at 100, the farm values in the United States in 1922 were 124; in 1925 were 127; in 1926, 124; in 1927, 119; in 1928, 117; in 1929, 116; in 1930, 115; in 1931, 106; and in 1932, 89. There has been a steady decline of all farm values in this country from 127 in 1925 to 89 in 1932.

That, Mr. President, is the situation that the farmer finds himself in, although he is plastered all over with tariffs. His corn bears a rate of 15 cents a bushel, and yet he is getting only 31 cents on the farm for it. His wheat bears a rate of 42 cents a bushel, and he is getting only 43 cents on the farm. His eggs have a tariff of 10 cents a dozen, and he is receiving only 10 cents a dozen on the farm for his eggs. His chickens have a tariff of about 10 cents a pound, and he receives only 12.6 cents a pound. His butter has a tariff of 14 cents a pound, and it is bringing in the New York market now only 17½ cents, which is the same as the price of similar butter from Denmark on the world market in London. His hogs have a rate of 2 cents a pound, and he is getting only 3½ cents on the farm. His hides have a rate of 10 per cent, and he is getting only 5¾ cents a pound for them. His oats have a rate of about 15 cents, and he has been getting less than that at times. And so on through the list of farm products, whether they have tariffs or no tariffs.

The farmer has suffered a loss in his commodity values since 1929 of 54 per cent, while the manufacturer on the average has sustained a loss of scarcely more than 30 per cent, with the result that while the farmer pays 114 for what he buys he gets only 52 for what he sells. That is the impossible condition that presents itself; and it is my judgment that so long as we turn away from and dodge these fundamentals of the agricultural situation, and seek by one artificial device after another to bolster up the farmer and scaffold him up in the hope that somewhere along the line he may pick up a few crumbs from the table of the manufacturer's tariffs which the manufacturer is able largely to collect, we are either consciously or unconsciously sending agriculture on to a state of permanent peasantry.

I shall not take the time to read a long list of figures and facts here as to what is happening. We are indulging in the happy dream that we can build up a wall here, and consume what we may be able of farm products, and then dump the others on the different countries of the world.

Mr. President, there is nothing more absurd and utterly visionary than the notion that we can dump our cotton and our wheat and all these other farm products on the other nations. The truth is—and I have here a long list of the laws and regulations governing imports of foodstuffs and other classes in most of the countries—that the country to-day, under our leadership, is largely in a state of economic war. It is largely on an artificial business basis. The nations are completely tied down by restrictions and restraints of every kind that impede commerce, that prevent countries from trading with each other. There is not a nation in the world to-day that could begin to pay us in gold the debts it owes, except France. The other nations could not pay us either in goods or in gold or in any other way under the existing economic practices of this and of other countries, under our leadership.

Mr. President, I do not think myself that we can afford to make the American farmer believe that the only source of relief for him is to go along and support this inordinate tariff policy that is dictated by the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries, and then endeavor by these artificial devices to get something out of this artificial situation. In the recent past he has suffered twenty-odd billions of steady losses, during which time almost all of his exports have dried up, with the result that his cotton and his wheat and his other commodities produced on a surplus basis have congested and the bottom has fallen out of the prices; and here we come, year after year, telling the farmer that we can contrive a sort of an artificial device here that will get him something out of this situation.

If we would go straight at the fundamentals of this matter, I think we really could accomplish wonders for American agriculture; but we would be obliged to repudiate this extreme embargo tariff policy, and this policy of almost utterly disregarding our opportunities to sell our surpluses in foreign markets. Nothing is more patent than the fact that a creditor and a surplus-producing nation can not avail itself of tariff rates or tariff benefits in so far as they relate to articles produced on a surplus-producing basis, and yet 90 per cent of the acreage in this country planted to crops relates to just such articles as I have referred to—articles produced on an increasing-surplus basis.

If I had my way, Mr. President, I would insist that the American farmers challenge this 1-sided and lopsided tariff and commercial policy which we are permitting our industrial friends to dictate supremely. It is true, as I stated, that they give agriculture the empty privilege of writing any kind of rates that in effect are purely paper rates except as to a limited number of these specialties that we grow in this country. If I had my way, I would have the American farmers and the general American public insist on a policy of moderation instead of this embargo tariff policy; insist upon liberal trade practices instead of restrictions and restraints on every exchange in the world, instead of barriers and obstructions to capital and goods whenever it is attempted to transfer them across international boundaries, and in that way offer some opportunity for nations to exchange their surpluses.

Mr. President, we have seen here and elsewhere the most amazing experiments that are intended to get us out of the predicament which these enormous surplus accumulations have brought upon us.

I have before me here a dispatch from down in Brazil. I want to state its substance to those who do me the courtesy to listen. This relates to the coffee situation down there, with which they have undertaken to deal, just as we have in this country with sugar and zinc and copper and lead and a long list of other commodities produced on a surplus-producing basis, which also includes wheat. Down in Brazil they have recently actually assembled and burned, openly and publicly and notoriously, more than 7,000,000 bags of coffee—good, sound coffee of the best quality—in order to decrease the supply and artificially raise and stabilize the price at a higher level. That not proving sufficient, however, they are now assembling 7,000,000 bags, or a total of $30,000,000 worth, in addition, in order to burn it and more securely raise and stabilize at a higher level the price of coffee.

Mr. President, it is devices of that kind that we in this country are being gradually driven to. It is just such artificial arrangements and contrivances that any nation on a substantial surplus-producing basis is inevitably driven to when it permits industry to fence itself off by prohibitive or embargo tariffs.

I know how uninteresting this viewpoint is to some, but it is not unusual to experience that situation. We have in this country to-day eight or nine million unemployed people, and they are on their feet at the instance of some of our ultra-high-tariff friends expressing their concern about poorly paid foreign labor. They would not for the world abandon that utterly nonsensical and false cry about serious competition as to the great majority of our industries from what they call ignorant pauper foreign labor. It is a paradox to see 8,000,000 absolutely unemployed, idle wage earners in this country, with its mountain-high tariffs, expressing fear about some kind of so-called ignorant foreign labor.

Then we have our six and a half million farmers with our 30,000,000 farm population that have steadily drifted down to the very verge of bankruptcy, failing up to this time either themselves or through their leaders to prepare a sound program that will deal with the actualities of the farm situation in this country.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In all the years in which the able Senator has served his country as a legislator, has he ever unearthed facts which have led him to believe that agriculture and manufacturing may be brought to a parity of returns on investments through the use of the protective tariff? If so, his conclusions differ from mine.

Mr. HULL. Not if we permit the manufacturer to write his own rates without restraint, and leave to the farmer the poor privilege of writing equally high rates, but most of which in effect are paper rates; and that is why the farmer is in his present situation.

This Nation could enter upon a policy of reasonable or moderate tariffs with such trade policies as would give us a market for all of our surplus, and permit both industry and agriculture side by side to go forward to a remarkable development. But that is not the proposition.

I was about to say that we have many strange conditions of psychology in this country. There is at Chicago to-day a seething mass of politicians, who are not even remotely thinking about anything except the prohibition question. Here is this Nation in the welter of the most destructive panic in human history, more people in a state of suffering and distress, greater opportunities for the relief of human misery, than have ever been offered a parliamentary body. Yet the leaders of a great political party at Chicago, according to the news reports, are not even thinking about remedies for these conditions of distress, either as to agriculture, or mining, or manufacturing, or any other group or section of our common country. We have been bumping along in this state of unprecedented distress for nearly three years, and no leadership yet has undertaken to offer a single basic remedy for a single basic cause of this awful economic collapse.

There is no time for anything except to talk about prohibition, or some other collateral or necessarily subordinate problem. I am not attempting to minimize prohibition or like questions, but I am attempting to emphasize the importance and the urgency, as well as the supreme duty of government, to go to the fundamentals of this awful panic situation and devise some sort of fundamental remedies.

The first thing I would do would be to join in a movement to reform our whole expenditure and tax and debt situation in this country—Federal, State, county, and municipal. Nothing is more patent than that since the war nations and individuals have hopelessly lived beyond their capacity and have piled up mountains of expenditures and taxes and debt beyond their ability any time soon to cope with.

There will be vast defaults and repudiations, both by governments and individuals, if we continue to go along under our present economic policies. I would launch a movement, if I had my way, which, within the course of one or two years, would lop off at least 35 per cent of our Federal, State, and local taxes and expenditures. I would appeal to other nations which are hopelessly loaded down with similar amounts of taxes and debt and are wholly unable to restore their economic and industrial and trade situations so as to buy from us and from each other—I would appeal to them to pursue the same policy of retrenchment and economy which, in my judgment, lies at the foundation of any satisfactory and permanent business and economic recovery.

The next thing I would do for the farmers would be to insist to the cotton farmer, for instance, that he undertake to place himself on the most highly efficient basis, to produce the best possible quality of middling cotton, a quality that would be at a premium in every market in the world and would sell itself. Then, as I said, I would have farm cooperation developed to the highest degree, from production to transportation and distribution. Then I would lower these artificial tariff costs which, in addition to internal taxes, bear so heavily on American agriculture, in such a discriminatory manner, tariff penalties and the resultant trade of obstructions, so that it is impossible for the farmer to market his surplus at anything like the cost of production.

I would thus lower his living costs, his production costs, and his transportation and marketing costs. In that way the farmer would to a large extent be set free from the most important and by far the heaviest impediments that press down upon him and prevent him from going forward.

The farmer will never get anywhere, in my opinion, until he adopts those fundamental policies, instead of blindly trailing along behind the embargo-tariff chariot of our good industrial friends.

That is an issue which the farmer will not get away from, and it is up to him to decide how many more years he cares to suffer and undergo further declines in the values of his products, further falls in the prices of his commodities, further increases of his mortgage indebtedness, until he is willing to rise up and demand of his leaders and his representatives that they adopt a set of basic policies such as I have described, instead of carrying on more or less of a sham fight with the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries in this country and subserviently following their leadership.

Mr. President, if anybody were at all interested in this subject, I could present a great many figures, and a great many facts, which unerringly show how agriculture has been crucified in this country and is to-day being literally crucified, while its spokesmen, well meaning no doubt, stand idly by and talk about some little artificial contraption which will enable the farmer to get on a stepladder and to climb up on a scaffold and hold out his hat and gather a few crumbs if they happen to fall from the tariff table of the chief manufacturing tariff beneficiaries. That is the situation. There is no use concealing it. We should emphasize it so that the farmers over the Nation will go forward with open eyes. They have nobody except themselves to censure for the discriminations which they are suffering and which they will continue to suffer under this species of legislation.

Mr. President, I felt that I should take these few minutes, in justice to myself and any others who might entertain similar views, to point out what in my judgment is the utter inexpediency and unavailability of these contrivances brought in here from time to time in the name of American agriculture.

I concede to others the same honesty of purpose I claim for myself, but I would not be frank if I did not label these proposals as being hopelessly unsound, impractical, and inefficient, as I think they are.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss the details of this bill. I merely desire to present what I conceive to be the economic policy that is raised by their presentation here. I hope that sooner or later there may be an awakening, that when enough more millions of farmers go into bankruptcy, and enough more millions of wage earners in this country go into unemployment, tragic as it is to contemplate such a thing even, we may finally have an awakening that will compel a reexamination of our position as a nation in the economic affairs of the world, and such new and modified policies as the great creditor and the greatest surplus-producing nation in the world should adopt.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I want to take a very few moments of the Senate's time, not to discuss farm relief, because I think that is an ignis fatuus, a will-o'-the-wisp, a disembodied spirit, but one which, like Banquo's ghost, will not down.

The farmers are the princes among the people now. There was a time only recently when the farmer was in very bad condition, but others have become so much worse off than he is that he ought to be congratulating himself. He has corn in the crib, wheat in the bin, meat in the smokehouse, and things of that kind, and while the wolf is howling around his door he can laugh. But that is not true with untold millions who do not know where their next meal will come from.

The farmer is never going to starve in the United States. He is not going to be hungry even. If he runs out of a few little things, he goes over to his neighbor to borrow. We have talked about the condition he is in until we have almost given him an inferiority complex. I think that if we let the farmer alone it will be the best thing that ever happened to him.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, AND REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. President, I said I was not going to talk about the farm problem. I want to talk for about four minutes about another matter.

On May 9 I introduced a joint resolution proposing to amend Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, which resolution, if it should finally become a part of the Constitution, would provide that the President and Vice President should be elected for a term of seven years and be ineligible for reelection for successive terms. The resolution further proposes to amend Article I, section 1, so that Representatives in the Congress shall be elected for a term of four years.

It seems to me that the proposed changes in the Constitution would be wise. Those who are familiar with the political history of our Nation know that the President during his first term devotes much of his time in preparation for a second nomination and election. He usually devotes the two first years of his first term to the selection of those that duty requires him to appoint. I am persuaded that political considerations largely influence these appointments. Merit does not count so much as the number of delegates the appointee may probably control in the next convention. The President would be less than human if he were not influenced by the probable effect on his political future that an appointment will have.

The President, looking to his renomination and knowing that certain measures, though unsound, are demanded by the voters in large groups, may be induced to advocate such measures, believing that he will gain votes thereby when he comes up for reelection.

To speak plainly, the President spends two years in building up a political machine and the next two years in perfecting it so it will operate smoothly. He neglects weightier matters which should have his attention.

That political machines are built up by Presidents is well illustrated by what is now taking place in Chicago. I speak as one having respect for the President who now occupies that position. There is no one in the Senate, regardless of his politics, who believes that the President would be renominated but for the influence of those he has appointed to office. Fully 90 per cent of the Republican voters of the Nation believe that his renomination is unwise, but they realize that they are powerless to prevent his nomination because of the organization which he has perfected. In fact, no one really favors the renomination of the President except the Democrats, and their desire is wholly selfish.

I am not criticizing the President for what he has done. Others occupying the office have done the same thing. Probably no more than three of our Presidents have not been guilty. It is the system that I complain of. The temptation should be removed. If he is made ineligible for the succeeding term, all temptation will be removed and he will consider merit of more importance than political influence. He will be made free, and only a man who is wholly free can serve his country well.

I propose a term of seven years because the Constitutional Convention in 1787 first fixed the term at seven years, and later changed it to four. But there is a better reason to my mind. If the term is seven years the election may be held at a time when there is no election for Members of the House or Senate. Many a worthy servant in these bodies has been defeated when he was mixed up in a presidential election when, if he had stood alone, he would have been returned.

This is no new proposal. Probably a hundred amendments have been proposed, which if adopted would have made the President ineligible for reelection.

I sincerely trust that the able Judiciary Committee will give this question serious consideration at its earliest convenience, and I have no doubt that it will do so.

I will speak a word about the proposed 4-year term for Representatives. The average Representative runs all the time. Since they are generally nominated in primaries, they often have two elections every two years. He is generally a poor man when he begins his congressional career, and he grows poorer every year. He ought to be given a respite. His term should be four years. He will be freer to follow his own judgment if his term is lengthened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending amendment is agreed to. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 15, after the word "carrier," to insert a dash.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 15, to insert:

SEC. 2. Sections 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of the agricultural marketing act, as amended, are hereby renumbered as sections 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 20, to strike out the word "title" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment just agreed to there should also be a similar amendment on page 17, line 23, where the word "title" should be stricken out and the word "act" inserted. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I shall propose certain amendments which, as stated, will overcome some of the objections—in fact, a major portion of the objections—to the allotment plan in the farm bill. I will state the amendments which I wish to propose and then outline the reasons for proposing such amendments. After I have outlined the reasons for proposing the amendments I shall formally offer them in order.

On page 18, line 6, I shall propose an amendment that, after the word "enter," there shall be inserted the words "into interstate," so that the sentence will read:

Such portion of any agricultural products shall enter into interstate commerce at a price per unit—

And so forth. I may say at the outset that three of the amendments refer to the allotment plan beginning on page 18.

The second amendment is, on page 18, lines 11 and 12, to strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board." I shall also propose an amendment, on page 18, line 13, after the word "market," to strike out the period and insert the words "unless perishable and farm products subject to processing and preserving."

I shall also propose an amendment on page 20, after the word "hereof," in line 3, to strike out the words "and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title," so that the penalty will apply only to the licensee and shall not apply to a seller, who, of course, in any event would be the farmer who produced the farm commodities or products.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On yesterday there was some discussion of the question as to whether the terms of the bill as presented impose a penalty on the producer. I expressed the opinion yesterday that the language does not warrant that conclusion. My study of the subject has been continued, and I must say that there is at least sufficient ground to justify the amendment which the Senator proposes, sufficient ground for the contention that the bill as written imposes a penalty upon the seller, having particular reference to the language on page 18 in section 14, and on page 20, lines 3 and 4, the latter being "and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title."

That is very broad language and it might be held by the courts to embrace a seller or producer who sells in the domestic market cotton which has been set apart for export. I think the amendment should be given serious consideration.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I think the Senator's views just expressed are correct. I have thought so from the beginning of the debate. In this connection, while the Senator from Arkansas has raised the question, I shall discuss the reasons why this amendment ought to be adopted rather than to take up the amendments in the order in which I have stated them.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the able Senator from Wisconsin just which language he desires to strike out?

Mr. BLAINE. I propose, on page 20, beginning with line 3, after the word "hereof," to strike out the words "and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title," so that the penalty clause then would apply only to the person who is the licensee and who intentionally or knowingly is making any purchase in violation hereof shall then be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and so forth.

Mr. McNARY. I think it highly important that that matter should be deleted. I am very happy the Senator has offered the amendment. So far as I am concerned, I shall accept the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to point out the reasons a little more specifically. Turning to page 18, it will be observed that "the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to ascertain and make public the part of domestic production"—I assume that means the production which is to be sold in the domestic market, that is, within the United States—"of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption." Then the language proceeds as follows:

Such portion—

That is, that portion of the agricultural product needed for domestic consumption—

Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced.

Mr. President, there can not be a purchaser of a farm commodity unless there is a seller. That, of course, is axiomatic.

So that if a licensee purchases a farm product for a price less than the cost of production as fixed by the board, the seller then has offered his product to enter commerce at the same reduced price, and thus becomes liable under the penalty clause. That is one proposition. The other is this:

The remaining or surplus portion—

That is, the portion that is not needed for domestic consumption—

if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Under that clause there is only one person involved, and that is the farmer—the man who produces farm commodities or farm products. If he should sell any portion of his milk, for instance, in my State, to be delivered to the consumers of milk in the city of Chicago, and that milk was surplus milk, he would be guilty of an offense under this provision. So, I think, under either of these two circumstances the farmer would find himself going to jail for the violation of the law.

I am sure it was not the deliberate intent of the authors of the bill or the proponents of this particular measure to impose any such penalty upon the producer of a farm commodity or a farm product.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Under the terms of the section does the Senator think that in the absence of action by the Farm Board any person selling a commodity would be liable in any way under the other terms of the bill? In other words, is it not a fact that under the provisions of the measure the Farm Board must make rules and regulations respecting any given commodity before anyone would be liable for doing anything about such commodity?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, that is a condition precedent. The Farm Board could bring into operation this proposed law; and when the Farm Board does bring into operation this particular plan and the farmer violates either one of the two conditions to which I have referred, the farmer will be penalized under this proposal unless the amendment shall be adopted.

I think that is made perfectly clear; I need not discuss that further. I therefore, Mr. President, propose an amendment—and I do this for the sake of hastening along the consideration of the bill—on page 20, line 3, after the word "hereof," to strike out the words "and any person who intentionally or knowingly violates any other provision of this title," so that the subsection will read:

(3) Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, intentionally or knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required pursuant to this section, or intentionally or knowingly makes any purchase in violation hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both.

I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, taking up the other proposed amendments in the order in which I mentioned them, I come back to page 18, line 6, and I wish to offer an amendment. On page 18, line 6, after the word "enter," to insert the words "into interstate," so that that particular sentence will read:

Such portion of any agricultural product shall enter into interstate commerce at a price per unit not less than the cost of production of such commodity as ascertained by the Federal Farm Board for the year during which such commodity was produced.

Mr. President, commenting upon that suggestion, I think it is admitted—and I express that opinion with a considerable definiteness—that there are no two lawyers, no group of lawyers or any single lawyer or any judge who would for one instant contend that Congress has power over intrastate commerce. In other words, Congress has no power to regulate commerce wholly within a State. There has been serious objection offered because the bill includes "any commerce" and applies all the conditions of the allotment plan not only to interstate commerce, that is, commerce between the several States and among the several States, but also applies the provisions of the plan to commerce within a State. By the adoption of such an amendment as I have offered that criticism would at once be removed.

I think I can also, with some degree of definiteness, state that there are no two laymen who, if they will sit down and think about this proposition for just a moment, will contend that Congress has any power to regulate commerce wholly within a State. The Constitution of the United States prescribes the powers and limitations upon Congress. Under section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, the United States Congress is given the power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Congress has no other power than that which is conferred upon it by the Constitution, and the Constitution confers power with respect to the regulation of commerce limited to the regulation of commerce "with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." So by the adoption of this amendment the criticism which has been applied to the bill will at once be dissipated so far as that constitutional objection is concerned.

Mr. President, this may be rather an irregular manner of presenting these amendments; but for the sake of expedition, I now offer the amendment to which I have referred, on page 18, line 6, after the word "enter," to insert the words "into interstate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. President, I propose another amendment, and I will point out the reasons why the amendment should be adopted. On page 18, lines 11 and 12, I move to strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board," so that the sentence in which said language is contained will read as follows:

The remaining or surplus portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Mr. President, after the Federal Farm Board has ascertained and directed and made public the portion of the domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption the power over the remainder of the production—that is, over the surplus—is vested in the Federal Farm Board. The Federal Farm Board has power under the paragraph I have read to permit the surplus portion to be exported and to prohibit that surplus from the market; that is, "it shall be withheld from market," and I presume that means the domestic market, and the board has the power to otherwise dispose of the farm product as the Farm Board may direct.

It may be contended—and I have heard it mentioned, though not very emphatically—that the Federal Farm Board would never enter an order for the destruction of any farm commodity or farm product; that the Farm Board would not be so silly, crazy, and insane as to direct the destruction of any surplus of a farm product. I am not so sure about that. If we may judge the future by the past, the chances are that the Federal Farm Board will be just as insane and just as crazy in the future as it has been in the past with respect to its suggestions. I am using the words "crazy" and "insane" not from the standpoint of the mental disability of members of the Farm Board; but in the operation of their functions and duties I think their suggestions have been absolutely asinine to the degree of insanity.

The Senator will recall that last year the Federal Farm Board advised and recommended that every third row of cotton be destroyed. The purpose of that was to eliminate the surplus. Mr. President, such a suggestion exhibits a condition of official-mindedness that not only borders on insanity but is official insanity.

Even worse than that, the Federal Farm Board made another suggestion, or at least by implication it made the suggestion. As all Senators know, my State is a great dairy State. I think over one-tenth of all the dairy cows of the United States are in the State of Wisconsin. As I recall—I may not be exact in the percentage now; it changes from time to time—but Wisconsin produces approximately 75 per cent of all of the American cheddar cheese and foreign cheese that is produced in the United States. Seventy-five per cent, three-fourths of the entire production of the United States, is in my own State.

Now, let us look at this suggestion of the Federal Farm Board. There is what is known as the Dairy Advisory Committee. I will not give the membership. There are some lawyers upon the committee who are drawing down some very handsome salaries as advisers to cooperatives for the legal advice that they may give. Some of those lawyers, as I say, are members of this Dairy Advisory Committee. There are some other men who are members of this advisory committee who are somewhat equipped to give some advice upon dairying but whose judgment, if followed, would result in tremendous loss to the dairymen of my State and the dairymen of every State.

This Dairy Advisory Committee, I do not know on what date, but I think it was October 20, 1931—the release for the afternoon papers was for October 22, 1931—issued a statement in which they recommended that all low-producing and unprofitable cows be culled from the herds and sold for slaughter. That was no new theory. The State of Wisconsin, under the direction of the agricultural department of the university, has been preaching that all dairy cows that are commonly known as "boarders," that do not make their board and keep, ought to be culled from the herds. That advice has been generally followed; and the Dairy Advisory Committee is about 40 years beyond the times on that. That has been going on in my State to a very high degree of perfection. But this is what they further advised:

> And that the farmer reduce the size of his herd by eliminating at least 1 cow out of every 10.

There is no way by which the farmer could eliminate any of the good dairy cows out of his herd except to send them to the slaughter or kill them and bury them upon the farm.

Mr. President, I happen to be in association with some farmers of my State who were interested in the possibility of taking over a cheese and butter factory, who had consulted me respecting the organization, and while we were chatting about that proposition I received this communication, and asked them what they thought about the proposition that the dairy farmer of my State, after he had culled out the useless or "boarder" cows, should kill or send to slaughter every tenth cow. The dairy farmers unanimously said, "Why, they are a lot of damned fools."

It may not be entirely parliamentary, but it was emphatic and mighty expressive. Remember, the Farm Board sponsored the suggestion and issued the newspaper release.

With those two illustrations, I am unwilling to trust to the Federal Farm Board the agricultural interests of this country, and give them the power to say that every other row of cotton shall be destroyed, and every tenth dairy cow shall be destroyed, and one out of a certain number of bushels of wheat shall be destroyed. We do not know what action they might take. I am unwilling, in view of their expression of opinion in the past, to put such great power into the hands of the Federal Farm Board—the power to tell the farmers of this country that they must not dispose of their surplus product except in some particular way as directed by the Federal Farm Board.

Striking out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board" will leave the sentence reading as follows:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

I now offer that amendment in the course of this debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAREY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, may the clerk please state the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, lines 11 and 12, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board," so that it will read:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin how this provision is to be worked out unless it is through the Farm Board or some other organization of that kind. The bill provides that it shall be done by the Federal Farm Board. If this were stricken out, it seems to me it would tend to destroy the value of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, my answer to that question is this question: Does the Senator from North Dakota believe in giving the Federal Farm Board the power to direct that a farmer shall destroy the surplus part of his production?

Mr. FRAZIER. This has nothing at all to do with that, that I see.

Mr. BLAINE. I am surprised. That is exactly what it says:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of—

How? "Or otherwise disposed of," how?—

> As directed by the Federal Farm Board.

Of course they have the power to dispose of that surplus crop by directing that it may and shall be destroyed. There is not any other interpretation that can be put upon that language. What other purpose has it? Where will the surplus go? It may not go into export. If it is withheld from the market it can not be sold.

Mr. FRAZIER. Why can it not go into export?

Mr. BLAINE. There may be no export market. It therefore could not go into the export market. The bill says, "withheld from the market." Well, when you withhold something from the market, and then provide that the Federal Farm Board may "otherwise" order some disposal of the product, of course, they have the power to destroy that crop or order that it be destroyed.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. If the domestic market can not absorb the product, it must be exported. It can not be used, can it?

Mr. BLAINE. If there is no export trade for it, where will it go?

Mr. HOWELL. If there is no domestic market for it, where will it go? For the portion used in the domestic market the farmer is to receive a United States price. If the domestic market will not consume the product, there is no other place for it to go but in export trade. That is the situation that exists to-day.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course there are places where it may go. It may go into storage if it is capable of being stored.

Mr. HOWELL. But this does not prevent it from being stored.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; it does not prevent it, and the Farm Board may not exercise the power; but the bill gives the Farm Board the power to dispose of the surplus. It says, first:

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported.

That is one thing. It shall be sent abroad. There may be no export market, however.

It shall be—withheld from market—

I assume that that means the domestic market. I do not know, but I assume so.

or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board.

What is meant by "or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board"?

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President, if the product comes into market, and, if sold, there, would destroy the domestic market, of course, the product should be withheld from the market until the domestic market can absorb it or until it can be exported.

Mr. BLAINE. Does not the Senator appreciate that power is given to the Federal Farm Board to direct the manner in which a farm product may "otherwise" be disposed of? That power is given to the board. It may not exercise the power, but the power rests in the board.

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President, we must give this board some power if it is going to rescue the farmer.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the Senator willing to give power into the hands of the board that will permit the board to destroy or order the destruction of a farm product?

Mr. HOWELL. There is no authority given here for the destruction of a farm product.

Mr. BLAINE. What is meant, then, by "or otherwise disposed of"?

Mr. HOWELL. If they can not export it, it might be used for processing other products.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose the processors have their shelves filled with the products. They will not take it.

Mr. HOWELL. Under present conditions they would not take it, either.

Mr. BLAINE. Now the Senator is begging the question. Assuming that there are products that are not going into processing, what is going to be done with those?

Mr. HOWELL. What would be done with them to-day if there is no market?

Mr. BLAINE. That is begging the question.

Mr. HOWELL. But here is a point where we can well beg the question, because we are endeavoring to do something for the farmer. We are endeavoring to give authority to aid him to get a United States price for that which he produces, inasmuch as he must pay a United States price for that which he buys. The Senator, however, would strike out this power and authority that we give to protect the farmer. That is the purpose of this legislation—to change the present methods of marketing farm products.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment. The Senator from Nebraska says we are trying to do something for the farmer. On this proposition what you are doing is something to the farmer. I have asked the Senator what he means by the language "or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board." That language must mean something. I have had no answer to that question. Does the Senator say that the Federal Farm Board would not have power to direct the destruction of a farm product of which there was a surplus?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I certainly would insist that there is no such power granted. It is to be assumed that a governmental agency will act with intelligence and justice to those for whom it is operating.

Mr. BLAINE. Not the Farm Board. Does the Senator recall that last summer the Federal Farm Board urged the cotton producers to destroy every third row of cotton and sent out a report from the dairy advisory committee, and sponsored it, advising that every tenth dairy cow be disposed of?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator is mistaken in saying that the Farm Board ever passed such a resolution. There might have been an agricultural advisory committee that recommended some such course, but certainly I am not aware of any resolution or final action by the Farm Board to that effect.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I shall not permit the Senator to put a misconstruction on what I said. I said that the dairy advisory committee passed a resolution. I said that the Federal Farm Board sponsored that resolution upon its official paper, and gave it out from the Federal Farm Board for release to newspapers on October 22, 1931, which resolution provided that the farmer reduce the size of his herd by eliminating at least 1 cow out of each 10 after he had culled out the "boarders" to which I referred. That is what the Farm Board did—it sponsored it. Furthermore, the Federal Farm Board actually recommended and urged the destruction of every third row of cotton.

Are we going to give into the hands of a department here at Washington such power of life and death over the farmers of this country, give to the Farm Board the right to direct which farm products and farm commodities, if there is a surplus, shall be destroyed? The farmers of this country will never for one moment indorse any such proposal when they know the facts.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not the Senator's view that if the Farm Board had had the power, instead of advising the farmers to plough up every third row, the Farm Board would have made them plough up every third row?

Mr. BLAINE. That was in their minds, of course. I assume that if they had had the power, they would have exercised it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under this bill, if they had that power, instead of telling the farmers what to do, they would order them to do it and make them do it.

Mr. BLAINE. They would order them to do it. I am assuming that the provision is a constitutional and valid provision. I am not discussing the validity or alleged invalidity of it. I am assuming that Congress has the power to do that which is proposed under the allotment plan in section 14. In view of that assumption, the power is conferred upon the Federal Farm Board to direct how the surplus may "otherwise" be disposed of, and that means that it may be destroyed if the Federal Farm Board so directs.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The language of the proposed bill is:

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Agreeing with the thoughts of the Senator, I also put the question, in the case of the dairy herd, if there is found to be a surplus production from that herd, it shall be exported;

but suppose there is no export market, and it shall be "withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market"—what is the farmer to do?

Mr. BLAINE. The doors are closed to him, of course, and therefore the Federal Farm Board would say, "We will direct that this be destroyed."

Mr. HOWELL. What would he do under present conditions?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator begs the question when he asks that.

Mr. HOWELL. I have a perfect right to beg the question.

Mr. BLAINE. But let me call attention to the fact that there is no Federal Farm Board to-day that has any power to tell the dairymen of our State that they shall destroy their milk, or that they shall destroy their calves, or that they shall destroy every tenth dairy cow; or the farmers of North Dakota that they shall destroy one-tenth of their wheat crop; or the farmers of Nebraska that they shall destroy one-tenth of their corn crop. There is no such power.

Mr. HOWELL. But the farmers in the Senator's State are getting 13 cents a pound for butterfat now. That is what the farmers are getting for butterfat to-day. Is not the Senator willing to make some disposition so as to afford them a fair price? The Senator knows they can not produce butterfat for such a price. How does the Senator propose to relieve them?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator is begging the question. I have not suggested that the farmer should not have a fair price for his product. I have not suggested that the farmer should not receive his cost of production. I have made no such contention, and it is unfair for the Senator even to intimate by inference that I have made any such suggestion.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I did not suggest that the Senator from Wisconsin had made such a statement. I stated the fact that the farmer to-day was getting 13 cents a pound for butterfat, and I asked the Senator how he proposed to come to the farmer's rescue.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator begs the question—repeatedly begs the question. The Senator has not yet advised the Senate in answer to my question: Will not the Federal Farm Board have the power to direct the destruction of a surplus?

Mr. HOWELL and Mr. FRAZIER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to have the Senator from Nebraska answer that question, after he has been so persistent.

Mr. HOWELL. I will answer the question, Mr. President. In my opinion, such a construction would not be upheld by any court.

Mr. BLAINE. I perfectly agree with the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. Then it could not occur.

Mr. BLAINE. I assumed the legality of this provision. I assumed that it was constitutional, and, indulging that assumption, if it is constitutional, the Federal Farm Board would be upheld by the courts. But I do not for one moment believe that Congress has the power to bestow on any commission or any department the right to declare that a surplus shall be destroyed. It is a good thing for this country that Congress has not that power. It is a good thing for the farmer. He should not be subjected to a bureaucracy here in Washington which could compel him to destroy his tenth dairy cow, to destroy one-tenth of his wheat, to destroy one-tenth of his milk, one-tenth of his butter, one-tenth of his cotton, or one-tenth of any commodity or product produced by him. The Constitution of the United States stands between him and a Congress that would confer such a power upon a board.

The Senator has stated exactly the proposition, that no court would uphold any such order, because we could not grant a board any such power. I do not assume for one moment that the Senator from Nebraska is endeavoring to palm off on the Senate an invalid and unconstitutional provision. I think more of the Senator than to believe that he would endeavor to palm off on the Senate and palm off on the farmers of this country an unconstitutional and an invalid provision. I do not believe the Senator from Nebraska wants to go so far as to give a promise to the ear, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] said.

The Senator has indeed expressed exactly the situation, that there is no authority in the Constitution for Congress to confer upon a Federal Farm Board, or any other body, the power or right to destroy products of the farm.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. There is no statement in this measure to the effect that the Federal Farm Board can order destruction of property. There is no statement of that character. The Senator from Wisconsin reads that into the measure, and I, controverting it, call his attention to the fact that any attempt to read anything of that kind into this measure would be prevented by a court. It does not follow, therefore, that I am for an unconstitutional provision in this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me ask the Senator what does follow a production of the farm when there is no export demand for it, no export market for it, when it must be withheld from the market? Where can that crop go?

Mr. HOWELL. It can be used upon the farm, just as skim milk is being used upon the farm now. There is no market for skim milk. What do the farmers do with it? Skim milk costs to produce. What are they doing with their excess skim milk? The situation in regard to skim milk is what would confront the farmer if he had a product which he could not sell in the domestic market and could not sell in the foreign market. What would he do with it? He would utilize it upon his farm as far as practicable. That is what he would do with it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator very ingeniously talks about skim milk used upon the farm. Why does he not say sweet milk or whole-cream milk? What the Senator says to the farmer is, "Take your sweet milk back to the farm and feed it to the hogs." That is what the Senator proposes.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. So far as operating a dairy at this time is concerned, statistics for the month of April for my State showed that a farmer was feeding a cow, was caring for it, was milking it twice a day, and getting 1 pound of butter fat from that cow, which was selling for from 13 to 14 cents a pound. I think the Senator will admit that it would probably have been better for the farmers who cared for cows during the month of April to have been rid of them, because they were not getting the cost of production from those cows. At the outside the estimate was that the farmer was making 1 cent a day per cow. That is the situation confronting the farmer in this country to-day, and we are endeavoring to find some way to remedy that situation.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is very evident that the Senator from Nebraska does not own a dairy farm, does not operate a dairy farm, does not milk any cows, has no cows to milk. He is one of the city advisers to the farmer. We have had a lot of them in the past. We have had business men advising the farmer, we have had the city folks advising the farmer until to-day the farmer has been brought to his knees, economically speaking. He has been following too long the advice of business men and city folks. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] sotto voce suggests "lawyers." May I intrude a personal note, so far as I am concerned, and say that my interests and investment as between my profession and a dairy farm is all in the dairy farm. I know the losses we are suffering. I know that there is no one who has a right here in Washington, either on the floor of the Senate or from a department, to tell the dairyman to take his milk home and feed it to the hogs.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment. The farmer pours milk into hogs that bring $3.50 per hundred pounds, and even less than that, so that the return on hogs is less than is the return on milk. Then for Senators on the floor of the United States Senate to suggest to the farmer to take his milk home and feed it to his hogs is surprising to me. I am not surprised that that sort of philosophy initiates this kind of a provision, which permits the Federal Farm Board to tell the farmer to destroy his cotton, to destroy his milk, to destroy his butter, to destroy his pork, to destroy any commodity of which there may be a surplus.

There is no answer to the question except the begging of the question. Of course, the farmers are distressed. That is no answer to the question I have been propounding. The power is lodged with the Federal Farm Board to direct the manner in which the surplus commodities on the farm shall be disposed of. That is the plain language. If the act should be held valid and constitutional, then that power is valid and constitutional and the Federal Farm Board can exercise that power. If this is not valid, if it is unconstitutional, then we should not hold out the promise to the farmer that it is going to aid them. If it is valid and if it is constitutional, then I am opposed to any proposal which authorizes a department or a board or the Government in any form or under any characterization to compel the farmer to destroy that which they determine to be the surplus crop.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. Is not the Senator in accord with a great deal of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not opposing the bill.

Mr. NORBECK. Are there not important features in the bill which, if put into effect, would put agriculture on a better basis?

Mr. BLAINE. Let me say to the Senator that there are many good features in the bill. There may be many good features in the allotment plan. What I am trying to do is to take out those features which are clearly unconstitutional, recognized even by the laymen as unconstitutional. I am endeavoring to perfect the allotment plan so I can with justification defend it.

Mr. NORBECK. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin misunderstood me. I was trying to call attention to the other parts of the bill. There is too much emphasis being laid on the things which may justify criticism and too much forgetting that a constructive measure is before us.

Mr. BLAINE. There is scarcely any criticism of those portions of the bill which are constructive. There are excellent provisions in the bill. There is no question about the debenture plan being a plan which will make the tariff effective as to farm products. The Senator from South Dakota and I are in absolute accord on that proposition. It is highly important that we have a measure enacted at this session of Congress to make the tariff effective on farm products. We were promised that away back in 1928. A special session of Congress was called for that purpose. I voted on every roll call to make the tariff effective as to farm products, and the Senator from South Dakota, to his honor, also voted to carry out the pledge that had been made. We are in absolute accord on that matter. I am not opposing the bill as a whole. I am endeavoring to perfect what I think ought to be perfected in the allotment plan, so that if there is any value in it those provisions which are clearly unconstitutional will be removed and the plan permitted to operate as an experiment only, perhaps. It may be only an experiment, but it may be worth while to experiment with it when we can also have the debenture plan and the equalization plan. But I do not propose to give the Farm Board power to destroy any portion of a farmer's crop.

Mr. NORBECK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Conceding that the measure does pass and that the debenture plan in the bill possesses some merit, are there any other provisions which have any merit? I confess that Title III is, to my mind, a most remarkable production, absolutely devoid of merit and calculated to produce——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him, but I was in hopes the Senator would not attempt to divert me with a general proposition. I am perfectly willing to answer any question, but I do not want to engage in a general discussion of the other provisions of the bill. I should be glad to answer a specific question.

Mr. KING. The Senator finds himself favoring the allotment plan?

Mr. BLAINE. I am endeavoring to perfect it as much as possible and to remove from it some of the provisions which are admittedly invalid.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will pardon me if I suggest that I think he would be serving the country far better if he would move to strike out all of Title III.

Mr. BLAINE. I want the opportunity to perfect it. It may be worth trying. It may be only an experiment, but I do not want an experiment that is going to put into the hands of the Federal Farm Board power to tell any farmer that he must destroy any portion of his product.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator would be doing a great service to his country if he would introduce some amendment that would take from the Farm Board powers which it now possesses and refuse to concede any proposition that increases its power. It has been such a failure, such a tyrannous, bureaucratic, inefficient body that the sooner we get rid of it the better it will be for the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have some precedent in the matter of the stabilization of prices and the power to destroy surplus. Brazil last year destroyed 7,000,000 bags of coffee beans, the estimated value of which was $30,000,000. That much coffee was burned last year. Does the Senator apprehend, if the bill should be passed, that it would give some such power as that to the Federal Farm Board whereby they might destroy whatever surplus they saw fit to condemn?

Mr. BLAINE. As I said, upon the assumption that the provision is valid and constitutional—I make that qualification—then under the provision the Federal Farm Board would have the power to determine the method of disposing of the surplus otherwise than as expressed in the paragraph in which that clause appears. That would mean beyond any question that the board would have the power to order the destruction of any portion of the alleged surplus farm crop or commodity.

Mr. President, in these times when we have millions of men and women and children out of employment, some of them without food, many of them on short rations of food, I can not understand why there should be a single ounce of food destroyed. It is far better to go back to the policy of the Pharaohs and store up during the years of plenty the surplus for the years of scarcity and famine. I am not in favor of placing in the hands of the Federal Board the power to destroy any portion of a product of the farm.

Mr. President, I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board," so the sentence would read:

> The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the amendment is to be voted on, I want an opportunity to speak on it a little while.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, for the time being I will withdraw the amendment and proceed with the next one. Probably there will be no objection to it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. On page 18, line 13, after the word "market" and before the period, insert the words "unless perishable and farm products subject to processing or preserving," so the sentence would read:

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market unless perishable, and farm products subject to processing or preserving.

I will discuss the amendment at this time. It will be observed that the paragraph which I have been discussing provides that—

The remaining, or surplus, portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

There are many perishable products which can be disposed of nowhere except in the domestic market. For instance, in my own State we have over one-tenth of the dairy cows of the country. We produce a veritable Niagara of milk. Our outlet for liquid milk and sweet cream is the city of Chicago to a very great extent. For that liquid milk and that sweet cream—milk that goes into the homes for the breakfast table, served with breakfast foods, and fed to the babies—the city of Chicago is a great market not only for the southern one-third of the dairy section of my State but as far north as 300 miles beyond the southern boundary of my State. That liquid milk is shipped that great distance, sometimes by automobile vacuum-tank trucks—that is, by trucks with vacuum tanks containing the sweet milk—and the same is true as to the sweet cream. The transaction involved in selling that milk to the city of Chicago is interstate commerce. There is a surplus of sweet milk and sweet cream during certain seasons of the year, seasonal surpluses. Under this bill every dairyman in the State of Wisconsin could be deprived of the Chicago market; under this provision that surplus could not be sold in the domestic market. So the sweet milk and the sweet cream which constitute a surplus, under the advice of the Senator from Nebraska, would be taken back to the farm and fed to the hogs. That is just exactly what would happen unless this amendment should be adopted respecting the liquid milk and the sweet cream of which there may be a seasonal surplus in connection with the Chicago milk market.

Mr. President, as I have pointed out, the paragraph provides that the remaining or surplus portion, if any, shall be exported. Of course, one can not export sweet milk and sweet cream; they are barred from the export market so far as Wisconsin is concerned. Perhaps the dairymen of North Dakota may be able to ship some of their sweet cream and sweet milk across the boundary line into Canada, but not so in the dairy States of the Union. I am substantially correct in saying that there can be no foreign export market for liquid milk and sweet cream. If it is to be withheld from the market, as the Senator from Nebraska says, the farmers then must be content to feed it to their hogs.

I am not exaggerating, Mr. President; I am setting forth the exact conditions that will prevail; and I think my own experiences afford me justification for pointing out such unreasonable provisions. Under the wording "or otherwise disposed of" as the Federal Farm Board may direct, of course, the board can direct that surplus milk shall be destroyed, poured into the sewers, or, as the Senator from Nebraska said, fed to the hogs.

Mr. President, milk is a highly perishable product; it can not be subjected to the air for long. The farmers can not afford to store milk in vacuum tanks. It must be consumed within a reasonable number of hours after its production—and the same thing is true as to sweet cream—or it must be turned into butter. Perhaps there may be a surplus of butter, and therefore the farmers can not sell their butter. In any event, milk and its products, of which there might be a surplus, would have nowhere to go under this bill except into the sewer or to be fed to the hogs.

Of course, the farmers might make their butter without the use of salt, and then use the butter for lubricating oil. Had the Senator from Nebraska been a little more familiar with farming he probably would have suggested that that also be done, as he suggested that the milk be fed to the hogs.

I do not criticize the Senator from Nebraska. I think he is perfectly sincere in this matter and perfectly honest—I am speaking of the junior Senator from Nebraska—but he, like many other honorable and sincere men, may have had only the pleasure of driving by the farmsteads but never the experiences that come to men who spend their lifetime upon a farm.

What I have said has to do with milk, a perishable product. The junior Senator from Nebraska will say that the provision on page 3 respecting the fourth finding of the board takes care of milk and other perishables. Let us examine into that.

Fourth. That the durability and conditions of preparation, processing, and preserving and the methods of marketing of the commodity are such that the commodity is adapted to marketing as authorized by this section—

In other words, as to milk which through processing can be reduced to powdered milk or canned milk the Farm Board might say that this surplus milk, because of the possibility of its preparation through processing, should be canned, powdered, or malted; but, Mr. President, canned milk, malted milk, and powdered milk exist in such great surpluses that there is nowhere for additional processed milk to go. So, under this provision, we are affording the farmer no avenue through which his liquid milk may go except to be fed to the hogs or poured into the sewers.

Then there is another proposition. Power, as I have said, is put in the hands of the Federal Farm Board to determine when that surplus, if it is not exported and is withheld from the market, how it can "otherwise be disposed of."

Mr. President, there is competition between the dairymen of Wisconsin and the dairymen of Illinois. If there were sufficient political pressure on the part of the people of Illinois to bring into operation the exercise of this power conferred upon the Farm Board, then, of course, the politicians of Illinois could put the dairymen of Wisconsin out of business, and they could do it through an order providing how the surplus milk should be disposed of. I call attention to the fact that milk from Wisconsin shipped to Chicago is interstate commerce, while milk from Illinois to Chicago is intrastate commerce, over which Congress has no control.

Mr. President, the possibilities of this allotment plan, under the provisions to which I have directed my criticisms, are such that any State having a surplus of a commodity could be discriminated against depending entirely upon political pull, if the Federal Reserve Board were subjected to such influences.

I am unwilling to place the great industry of agriculture in the hands of a board appointed by the President, political creatures of an administration or a party, sometimes appointed in order to discharge a political debt. I am unwilling to place in a board so constituted the power to destroy the dairy industry of my State and the agricultural industry of any other State.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should like the Senator's opinion in regard to the operation of Title III of the bill as it deals with other agricultural products. The State of Idaho produces large quantities of alfalfa. The sheepmen of Utah have frequently purchased hay in Idaho to feed their sheep during the winter. Suppose that the Farm Board had the power proposed to be given by this measure should determine that the amount of hay needed for domestic use in the United States for the next year was, say, a million tons. Under the bill the board would be required to ascertain the cost of producing that hay. Of course, it is absurd to say it could, because the conditions vary so. In Arizona, where they raise four crops of alfalfa, 8 tons or more to the acre, the cost is much less than it is in other parts of the United States; but, waiving that point, suppose the board fix a million tons as the quantity necessary for domestic consumption. A million tons are produced outside of Idaho. Idaho produces a surplus of 100,000 tons of hay which she must dispose of. It can not be disposed of in the State, because of no local needs. The producers of the hay can not ship it to the Pacific coast and across the sea, because the cost is prohibitive. They can not ship it to Canada, because the costs are prohibitive. What could the owners do with this surplus?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of course, hogs would not eat dry alfalfa.

Mr. KING. Of course not.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not making this suggestion seriously; but the farmers could take the alfalfa and burn it in the furnace.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. BLAINE. That is about the only place where the surplus could go.

Mr. KING. So that under the provisions of this bill the farmers of Idaho would suffer irreparable loss.

Take my own State: We grow some of the finest fruit in the world. How would it be possible for the board to find out the cost of pears and cherries and peaches, and so forth, the fruits which we grow in abundance and, indeed, of which we have a great surplus? But suppose they do have sufficient wisdom to determine the number of bushels of pears and peaches required for domestic use in the United States during the year, and the people of Utah have produced an enormous surplus, and that surplus exceeds the maximum amount which the board under this power fixes as the domestic consumption for the year. What disposition will be made of this surplus? It can not be sent to England, nor to Canada. The producers of the fruit would not dare to sell it because of the provisions of this bill, if it exceeds the domestic needs as determined by the board, to anybody in the United States. Apparently the fruit would have to be destroyed, as I understand the terms of this bill. Am I right in my interpretation of it?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is only partially correct. Let me outline an example.

Take potatoes, for instance—Idaho potatoes. I did not intend to advertise Idaho potatoes especially, because Wisconsin potatoes are——

Mr. KING. A little better? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Well, at any rate, quite equal; they are all fine potatoes. The Federal Farm Board investigate the number of bushels of potatoes, the number of hundreds of pounds of potatoes produced, and they find that there are so many thousand pounds of a surplus. We will use, just for example, 500,000 pounds. If we carry out the interpretation of this bill, and the only interpretation we can place upon it, this is what would result:

We will assume that there is no export trade for those potatoes. Therefore, they can not be exported. They are withheld from the market, or they are otherwise disposed of, as directed by the Federal Farm Board. There are two ways of disposing of potatoes. One is to turn them into liquor, moonshine. That might be the most profitable one. Of course the Federal Farm Board would not direct a violation of the Volstead Act, however; so the Federal Farm Board, compatible with the eighteenth amendment, would say, "Now, we will use the other method. We will direct that those surplus potatoes must be turned into starch," and they have the power to do it under this bill. But where will the starch go? There is a surplus of starch; and that is why I am offering the amendment. That is a good illustration of why I am offering the amendment, to take perishable and other farm products that are subject to processing and preserving and lift them out of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator referring to Title III?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; the allotment plan.

Mr. BORAH. By the time the Senator gets through with it, there will be nothing left of it. Why not lift Title III out of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing for the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to leave his wheat in, if he is willing to take that chance with the farmers of North Dakota. I am perfectly willing for the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to leave his sugar in, if he is willing to take chances with the sugar producers of Nebraska. I am perfectly willing for the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to leave his hay in, if he wants to take a chance with the farmers of the State of New Hampshire. So I am accommodating the junior Senator from Nebraska, the senior Senator from North Dakota, and the senior Senator from New Hampshire. In fact, that permits the senior Senator from New Hampshire to join the "sons of the wild jackass." [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. Even the company of the Senator from New Hampshire would not assuage my feelings or change my opinion with reference to some of the provisions which have nothing to do with the matter the Senator is discussing. For instance, there is left in the bill the provision that "it shall be unlawful for any licensee to purchase any agricultural products at a price less than the cost of production proclaimed by the Federal Farm Board."

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing to leave that in. If we can obtain for the farmers, by this provision, the cost of production, the farmers will have made considerable progress in this Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what he has against the "sons of the wild jackass"? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. As I am included as one of them, I have not anything against them, but inasmuch as the Senator from New Hampshire on yesterday pleaded that his hay be brought within the terms of this bill, I thought the "sons of the wild jackass" ought to invite him into their company. It was purely an act of generosity toward the Senator from New Hampshire, recognizing his complete conversion.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I must remind the Senator that I had a trinity of products—hay, apples, and potatoes.

Mr. BLAINE. I am trying to take the apples and potatoes out from under the bill and leave the hay in.

Mr. MOSES. I am not sure that that is an act of kindness to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes; it is to the farmers of New Hampshire. It may not be to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not that our great problem here—to get the article of consumption to the consumer? And if we get the hay to the wild jackasses, will not that solve that part of the problem?

Mr. BLAINE. I thought that was a splendid combination—to leave hay in, so that the Senator from New Hampshire would have a complete conversion, and we might take him into our society.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not mean to be facetious about this very serious proposition. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that my great objection to Title III is that if this bill ever should reach the President of the United States, I not only think he would be justified in vetoing it, but I do not see how he could avoid vetoing it. The other two propositions would necessarily fall with it. It is so unquestionably void that I think we would destroy the whole bill. I do not think the President could find an excuse for signing it, and I have no reason to suppose he would be hunting for a reason to sign it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator believe, under all the circumstances, that the wiser course to pursue is either to defeat this bill in its present form or to recommit it and let the committee consider it further, in the light of the observations and suggestions which have been made?

Mr. BLAINE. Let me perfect this section, and then we will take up that discussion.

Now, Mr. President, I have pointed out the matter of liquid milk, and so forth, and the perishables, and what would happen; but the same thing would happen to potatoes; the same thing would happen to all fruit; the same thing would happen to all vegetables. It would happen to any farm product that is perishable or that is capable of being processed or preserved, because on page 3 the bill provides:

> Fourth. That the durability and conditions of preparation, processing, and preserving and the methods of marketing of the commodity are such that the commodity is adapted to marketing as authorized by this section.

Which, of course, means that the board may apply this plan to milk, because it can be adapted to processing, as I have pointed out. It can apply it to vegetables, because the larger number of vegetables are the subject of preserving or processing. The same thing is true with respect to fruit. The same thing is true with respect to a great many farm commodities, which are, in the nature of things, perishable and must be disposed of somewhere very shortly after they have been taken from the soil; and many of these farm products are not adapted to exportation. They can be sold only in the neighborhood, or close to the neighborhood, or by rapid transit to distant parts within the United States, which, of course, would not be in the export market or foreign market. So my amendment provides "unless perishable and farm products subject to processing or preserving."

I ask that that amendment be inserted in line 13, page 18, after the word "market," striking out the period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 13, after the word "market," it is proposed to insert "unless perishable and farm products subject to processing or preserving."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALCOTT in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, there appears to be no minority report on the pending measure. Does the Senator from Wisconsin know whether the committee was unanimous in reporting the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that there is a report on the bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. But no minority report?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps the Senator from Oregon will advise us. Is there a minority report on the pending bill?

Mr. McNARY. I must advise the Senator from Colorado that there is no minority report. The report was made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Was the committee unanimous with respect to the measure?

Mr. McNARY. Not as to the allotment plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. President, I renew my other amendment on page 18, lines 11 and 12, striking out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAINE. I will ask the Senator from Arkansas to withhold his proposition until a vote can be taken upon the amendment I have just offered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; I will withhold the matter I was about to present.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, is the Senator from Wisconsin going to hold the floor and ask to have votes taken on amendments without giving other Senators a chance to discuss them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any Senator can discuss the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment is subject to discussion. I have no desire to prevent discussion of it. I yield the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. I asked the former occupant of the chair to allow me to discuss the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin yields the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield the floor to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have no objection to the Senator holding the floor as long as he wants to, but I do object to his insisting on holding the floor and having amendments agreed to without giving other Senators an opportunity to discuss them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has yielded the floor.

THE FURLOUGH PLAN

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I hold a table furnished by the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association showing how the furlough plan discriminates against rural carriers. I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT ON REDUCTION OF APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to call from the table Senate Resolution 235. I have agreed on a revision of the resolution, striking out the first clause of the preamble and other amendments to conform thereto, and I understand there is no objection now to the adoption of the resolution. So I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, and I send to the clerk a copy of the resolution as revised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection in granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COUZENS. Let the resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 235) submitted by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas on June 13, 1932, as modified, as follows:

Whereas the President with the assistance of the members of his Cabinet and the heads of the independent offices and commissions is in better position within the short time before Congress adjourns to ascertain in what departments, bureaus, commissions, and independent offices a further reduction of governmental costs can be brought about and how it may be done: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President is requested to confer with the members of his Cabinet and the heads of all bureaus, commissions, and independent offices upon the best way to bring about said reduction in appropriations, and to submit to Congress for its consideration specific suggestions covering each item that the President recommends as a suitable way and place to accomplish such reduction in the appropriations for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask why it is thought necessary to put into the resolution the provision that the President confer with his Cabinet?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. For the simple reason that heretofore when reductions have been made in appropriation bills, apparently with the approval of the President, Cabinet members are reputed to have come to the Congress and opposed the reductions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can say that they did come before the Committee on Appropriations and did oppose reductions.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that that is a fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator objects to that provision of the resolution, I would not object to eliminating it.

Mr. BORAH. I know that they have come to the Congress as has been stated, and I have no doubt that they will come here in the future.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The object of the resolution is to preclude that if practicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas, as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ESLICK

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it does not seem possible to reach a final vote on the bill this afternoon, as I had hoped earlier in the day. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is willing to yield the floor to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] for the purpose of offering a resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair may lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives just communicated to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALCOTT in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions (H. Res. 265) were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 14, 1932.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a few moments ago Representative E. E. ESLICK, of Tennessee, fell dead while making a speech in the House of Representatives. He was speaking in behalf of the soldiers' bonus when the tragic end came.

Mr. ESLICK was one of the ablest men in the House, and he was making a very eloquent speech. He had almost reached his peroration when he suddenly fell, and never revived. His devoted wife was sitting in the gallery, listening to the eloquence of her distinguished husband, when he so suddenly passed away.

I am told that it was one of the most tragic scenes that ever occurred in the House. There never was a finer man. He was beloved by all who knew him, especially in his district and in his State, where everyone admired him.

On a future occasion I shall pay tribute to his splendid character and to the invaluable services he has rendered his State. For the present I simply desire to offer resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 236) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Presiding Office to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Under the second resolution the Presiding Officer appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], and the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 15, 1932, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 14, 1932

The House was called to order at 11 o'clock a. m. by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Another night, another day, Gracious Lord, and we are still in the hands of a living God. It is the gladdest truth creation holds. In its deathless worth all strength and virtue lie. In the frailty of our human nature it sustains us in our keenest trials. Our Father, we rejoice that in this universe of change, with its heavenly splendors, with its immeasurable depths, with its unthinkable spaces, one thing is fixed—the love of God. O Eternal Son of God, Thou joy of all loving hearts, Thou light of men, Thou fount of life, we turn to Thee with praise and thanksgiving and ask for a continuance of Thy mercies. Guide us, encourage us, and hold our feet as stable as the Rock of Ages. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3847) entitled "An act to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. METCALF, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. COPELAND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. HALE and Mr. TRAMMELL members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Navy department.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1663. An act to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails;

S. 3323. An act to provide funds for cooperation with the school district at Nespelem, Wash., in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Colville Indian Reservation;

S. 3879. An act to amend an act approved May 14, 1926 (44 Stat. 555), entitled "An act authorizing the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota to submit claims to the Court of Claims"; and

S. 3950. An act to amend section 21 of the act approved June 5, 1920, entitled "An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes," as applied to the Virgin Islands of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 4738. An act to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The House yesterday discharged the Committee on Rules from the consideration of a resolution making it a special order to consider the adjusted service compensation bill. The House then adopted the resolution which makes it to-day in order as a special order to consider that bill. The House having voted in favor of the proponents of the legislation and the Ways and Means Committee having made an adverse report on it, the effect of the vote of the House is to turn down the Ways and Means Committee and place control of that legislation in the hands of its friends. Under these circumstances and under the parliamentary rules and procedure of the House are not the friends of the legislation entitled to have charge of the bill when we go into Committee of the Whole to consider it and to have the management of the measure on the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proponents and the friends of the bill will, of course, have charge of it from now on.

WAGES OF LABORERS AND MECHANICS EMPLOYED BY CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3847) to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I assume the House conferees will insist on the position taken by the House in a very pronounced vote as to the changing rate of wages.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; and there is one other matter we think we will take out—the Panama Canal item.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. CONNERY, GREEN, RAMSPECK, WELCH of California, and KOPP.

COMPILATION RELATING TO VETERANS OF VARIOUS WARS

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on Printing, presented the following privileged report (S. Con. Res. 29), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 29

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, dated May 12, 1932, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 412 (71st Cong.), a compilation of all Federal laws relating to the veterans of our various wars, be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document; and that 15,000 additional copies shall be printed for distribution by the Veterans' Administration, of which there may be furnished, upon written application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, one copy to each post of the Grand Army of the Republic, the American Legion, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, to each camp of the United Spanish War Veterans, and to each chapter of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not asking that the resolution be taken up for passage now. It is a rather important resolution. It is a privileged resolution, and I want it to be printed and go on the calendar. I shall call it up a few days later. I think the Members are entitled to see what is proposed by the resolution.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, and pending that motion I would like to make this statement.

The members of the Ways and Means Committee who are favorable to this legislation will have charge of the proponents' side, and I ask the Speaker to recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] instead of myself in the allotting of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] will be recognized for that purpose.

The Chair desires to again admonish the galleries that under the rules of the House expressions of approval or disapproval from the galleries are not permitted, and this rule will be strictly enforced to-day.

The gentleman from Texas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7726, the adjusted service certificate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7726, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], which will be one hour? Of course, I will have to ask him to take care of Members on that side of the House who are opposed to the bill.

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the Republican side could not have a little more time, as there are more Members on that side opposed to the bill?

Mr. CRISP. I realize that what the gentleman says is true, but I can not agree to give more than one-half of my time. If, later on, I find it is possible, I shall be glad to do so, but I can make no promises now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate deeply being honored with permission to open debate upon this very vital proposal.

The sponsors of this legislation take the position that the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in full at this time only if it can be done advantageously to the United States and to the betterment of the economic status of the country.

Our friends in opposition continually refer to what will happen if this bill were to become law. They paint a picture of havoc and near chaos. I would remind them that we are now submerged in the worst money panic that our Nation has ever witnessed. I would remind them that we have already arrived at the brink of ruin. We have reached this point without any urge from this legislation. Since December last I have supported every measure advanced for the relief of our country except the moratorium. We were told that unless the moratorium was passed chaos in Europe would reign, which would likewise destroy this country. We were told that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, the Glass-Steagall bill, several other bills upon banking and currency, the revenue bill, and many other measures were needed to restore the confidence of a people—to restore this country to prosperity. Many of these measures have been helpful. But they are superficial palliative treatment of the patient without getting to the roots of the disease. This measure, in my judgment, goes at the basic conditions underlying our weakened economic structure.

No one will deny that the dollar to-day is a high dollar. Economists rate it as worth $2 as compared to the 1919 dollar and about $1.60 as compared to the dollar in 1926. Back home, values are such that leading business men think of it now as a 2-dollar dollar. At the other end of the pendulum we have price commodities at the lowest level in our history. Undoubtedly, before there can be substantial permanent relief to our country the differential between the dollar and the commodity values must narrow.

None of the measures we have considered, in my judgment, reach out as effectively in that direction as does the measure we have under consideration. The opponents say that there will be an inflation of values. The adverse report states this as one of the objections to the measure. Frankly, I think this is what we need. As a matter of fact, the main opposition to the bill comes from those who would not have the high value of the dollar affected. I believe that these gentlemen are standing in their own light. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that this economic condition which pushes our backs to the wall was brought about deliberately by an attempt to manipulate the values of securities with the expectation of making untold millions. The squeeze came in 1929. Values of securities declined; calls were made for loans; securities were thrown upon the markets in unprecedented amounts and the situation got out of hand. The worst financial debacle the world has ever seen occurred. Billions in values were dissipated overnight. The wheel of the financial engine traveled as fast in reverse as it had traveled forward in the prosperous years. Finally it jumped off center. We have been placing a "chock under the wheel," we have been giving it superficial treatment, but as yet the wheels have not started in a forward direction. It is hoped by the sponsors of this measure that it will do that thing.

Our position certainly takes high ground when it is predicated upon benefits to our country, rather than immediate benefits to a particular class to the detriment of that nation which the favored class served so well. There is a wide difference of opinion as to the measure. I realize that the country generally has received an inaccurate picture of it and its purpose. In discussing the matter with Members of Congress, I am struck with the honest misunderstanding that many have of it. It is not putting it strongly when I say there are not a great number of people who have given much study of the money question. To most of us it was a mystery, and to many, even of this body, it remains a mystery. As a matter of fact, there is no mystery in it. But there are those who would have it remain a mystery. They would enshroud the gold dollar with the cloak of divinity and declare to be heretics all those who would not worship at its shrine. They would have the country believe that the currency of this country is backed by gold and that money not so protected is "fiat" money. Thus it is in this fight, even our colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee resorted to the argument that sponsors of this measure sought to put the printing press to work. We have some $1,800,000,000 of currency behind which there is not a single dollar of gold.

Sponsors of this bill in the committee sought to amend H. R. 7726 by striking out section 2 therein and inserting in lieu thereof language putting into legislative effect the Owen plan, which related to the currency to be issued hereunder. Eleven members of the committee of 25 supported that amendment, with 14 in opposition thereto. When the bill comes up for reading this motion will be made in the House and the sponsors of the measure will insist upon this amendment. At this point I will read the amendment which will be offered:

SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be issued and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

It should be stated that no one has testified that the original Owen plan, or the plan heretofore referred to, or the plan of Senator THOMAS does not present sound money mechanics. It may be that section 2 of the Patman bill providing for the direct issual of Treasury notes without a reserve in the form of Government bonds, or without the use of bonds being placed in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board to be used for the purpose of contraction of the currency if the expansion thereof became undue, might have had just criticism, but leading economists testify that the controlled-currency idea advanced by ex-Senator Owen and by Senator THOMAS is sound mechanically.

I quote from the hearing a part of the testimony of Prof. Irving Fisher.

Mr. RAGON. Now, if I understand the Patman bill correctly, there is no provision made at all for any redemption of any of this currency. That looks to me, as a layman, like an uncontrolled expansion of our currency. Now, under the Owen plan, if I understand that, he has a method there of controlling that expansion, or, you might say, contracting that expansion. As I gather from your remarks, there are two dangers, deflation and inflation, and it may become necessary to contract or to deflate the currency.

Mr. FISHER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. RAGON. Under the Patman plan I see no machinery at all for contracting, but in the Owen plan I do see that.

Mr. FISHER. Yes; because it is redeemable.

Mr. RAGON. Therefore you would call any issue of currency under the Owen plan, would you, a controlled expansion, or would that expansion be controllable?

Mr. FISHER. It would be controllable; yes. I do not think that is quite what Secretary Mills meant.

Again, at page 666 of the hearings:

Mr. VINSON. As I understood you, you say that the Owen plan or the Thomas plan is perfectly sound in money mechanics?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Also I read from the testimony of former Senator Robert L. Owen, dealing with the integrity and soundness of the proposed currency to be issued under the amended bill, with his remarks relative to the parity of money as a result of what is known as the gold standard act of March 14, 1900:

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means, when I had the honor to appear before you previously, I had no sufficient opportunity to answer a question propounded by my good friend, Mr. RAINEY, who was evidently under the impression that the money proposed to be issued for the payment of the soldier's compensation would not have behind it an adequate gold redemption fund. I want to call the attention of the committee to the act of Congress passed on the 14th of March, 1900, known as the gold standard act. * * * I ask permission to put in the record the first and second sections of that act, because it shows that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by that act to use the credit powers of the United States to maintain at parity all forms of money issued by the United States.

The sections referred to are as follows (hearings, pt. 14, pp. 784–785):

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be the standard unit of value and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

SEC. 2. That United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of the standard fixed in the first section of this act, and in order to secure the prompt and certain redemption of such notes as herein provided it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to set apart in the Treasury a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin and bullion, which fund shall be used for such redemption purposes only, and whenever and as often as any of said notes shall be redeemed from said fund it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use said notes so redeemed to restore and maintain such reserve fund in the manner following, to wit: First, by exchanging the notes so redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the United States notes so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes, in accordance with the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods, and the amount of such gold coin and bullion in said fund shall at any time fall below $100,000,000, then it shall be his duty to restore the same to the maximum sum of $150,000,000 by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after one year from the date of their issue, and to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the gold coin received from the sale of said bonds shall first be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanged, in the manner hereinbefore provided, for an equal amount of the notes redeemed and held for exchange, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, use said notes in exchange for gold, or to purchase or redeem any bonds of the United States, or for any other lawful purpose the public interests may require, except that they shall not be used to meet deficiencies in the current revenues. That United States notes when redeemed in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be reissued, but shall be held in the reserve fund until exchanged for gold, as herein provided; and the gold coin and bullion in the reserve fund, together with the redeemed notes held for use as provided in this section, shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. Every citizen, no matter how humble he be, ought to know that the parity of the money issued by the United States has been faithfully preserved from that time to this, and even copper money can be converted into gold at the option of the citizen.

These notes, therefore, have behind them not only whatever is available in this country in the form of gold, but they have behind them the powers of the people of the United States through their Government to use its full credit to keep at parity any money which this Congress shall authorize.

I do not need to waste time on that question.

To show you concretely that we do have money without gold reserve, I call up this fact: On March 31, 1932, our total outstanding currency was $5,459,085,385. Our total gold reserve held by the Treasury and the Federal reserve bank was $3,594,694,087. In other words, the currency outstanding in excess of the total gold reserve was $1,864,391,298. To be specific, national-bank notes of which on that date we had almost $700,000,000, has no gold reserve. This currency is backed by Government bonds bearing the circulating privilege and approximately $30,000,000 in lawful money. No, Mr. HOPKINS; not gold, but lawful money. The value of the silver dollar in April of this year was 28 cents. We had some $500,000,000 in silver certificates with silver dollars in like number as reserve. The actual value of the reserve was $140,000,000. That means that $360,000,000 of those silver certificates had the same backing that the national-bank notes had—that is, the credit of the Nation. Federal reserve notes require a minimum of 40 per cent reserve in gold and, prior to the Glass-Steagall bill, 60 per cent in commercial paper. On March 31, 1932, there were $2,545,943,397 of such currency. The gold reserve behind these notes on that date was only $290,230,623 less than the total Federal reserve notes in circulation. Yet a little more than $1,000,000,000 in gold was required as the legal gold reserve for such Federal reserve notes.

Not many days ago, in the consideration of a bill from the Banking and Currency Committee, we were told that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, had approved an amendment to the banking act placing the debentures, bonds, and obligations of the intermediate-credit banks upon a parity with commercial paper and Government bonds for the purpose of the issuance of Federal reserve notes. The House passed such a bill. It is more than passing strange to me that the Treasury would approve secondary obligations of this character as a reserve for currency and then object to the issual of currency backed by direct obligations of the Government itself.

We are told that we have $5,400,000,000 outstanding currency. Of this amount two and one-half billions is in circulation. We make this statement upon the authority of Doctor Goldenweiser, director of research and statistics of the Federal Reserve Board, who testified before the committee as follows:

Doctor GOLDENWEISER. I have some figures here that will interest you. It shows that of the five and a half billion dollars of currency outstanding, there is about $750,000,000 in the banks, and about $1,250,000,000 probably still in hoards accumulated in the past 18 months and about $500,000,000 also in hoards but not created in this panic; just ordinary hoards, people having a little nest egg tucked away. There are about three hundred millions that are abroad, of which one hundred millions are in Cuba and two hundred millions in other countries, and about $100,000,000 has been destroyed. So that the total amount of money that does not do any actual business is $2,900,000,000 and the active money is about $2,500,000,000.

With $2,200,000,000 of new currency issued, the amount of currency in circulation would still be $700,000,000 shy of the actual amount of currency now outstanding.

It is thought by some that the money would find its way into the banks, and hoarding would result. It is easy to criticize the banks and their slowness in extending credit. But you must remember that the banks are trustees of the deposits of that institution. The property values have depreciated, securities have declined to almost the vanishing point. The Federal reserve bank has not been particularly lenient, and for these and many other reasons banks are slow to extend credit. But with this flow of new currency into their vaults they would have added money, and their natural instinct would be to liberate money for the purpose of earning money for the institution. In this wise the velocity of money would be accelerated. The turnover is one of the essential needs for this country's return to prosperity. Without money and without an opportunity to obtain credit the business man is unable to operate his business. That means that the laborer is out of employment; that means that the farmer has no market for his commodities; that means that his purchasing power has lowered almost to the vanishing point, which, in turn, means that the product of the mill and the factory used by him is not forthcoming. It is an endless chain. We believe that once the wheel is started toward progress its speed will be accelerated, the purchasing power of our people will be magnified, the differential between the dollar and the commodity prices will be narrowed, and normal conditions will at last prevail.

Our friends in the Treasury and on the Federal Reserve Board state that they have been granting credits to the banking institutions in stupendous sums. That such credits have been made we do not question, but let us examine the method of this expansion of credit and compare it with the expansion of both credit and currency that will come from the enactment of this law.

The Glass-Steagall bill became law February 27, 1932. Since that date the Federal Reserve Board has purchased Government securities totaling $1,259,976,550. This brings the purchases up to June 9. Between February 27 and this latter date the Federal reserve banks have sold securities in the sum of $172,502,300. This makes the amount of bonds purchased in excess of that sold between these dates the sum of $1,087,474,250.

The operation is as follows: The Federal reserve bank purchases the United States bonds from the member banks. They pay for it by charging off the indebtedness of the member bank to it and by crediting said member bank's account with it for the remainder; or, if the member bank does not owe the Federal reserve bank, they simply credit their account with it for the purchase price. The books of the member bank are not changed except that its debt to the Federal reserve bank is marked off, but its assets are reduced by the amount of Government bonds so sold. Certainly, it eases up the member bank. They probably are relieved from the fear of a call from the Federal reserve bank to the extent of the value of the bonds at least, and some benefits obtain. But the facts certainly convince that this method, buying bonds—the open-market operation—has not been effective in permitting the banks to extend credit to business men throughout the country. The facts, undoubtedly, show that this vast operation, practically $1,100,000,000 in credits—one-half of the amount involved in this adjusted-service certificate proposal—has not started the wheels turning in advancing direction.

On the other hand, when this currency is distributed by the payment of the adjusted-service certificate, the most evenly distributing method that could possibly have been provided, the new currency paying the obligations of American citizens, many times over, finally finds its way to the banks in every community, in every State of the Union. This money is an added resource. Undoubtedly the last creditor to whom it is paid, the gentleman or the business concerns who deposit it in the bank will have use for it in the payment of their obligations and ad infinitum. It is our contention that the expansion of currency includes expansion of credit.

My friends, the fact that the gold reserve of this country will support expansion of the currency admits of no argument. The mere statement of the amount of gold used as the reserve of the Federal reserve notes shows beyond contravention that an expansion of currency can be had. But we do not have to reach that conclusion with our mental efforts alone. We will read from the Federal Reserve Bulletin of March, 1932, which is an authoritative statement in support of our views, which statement was indorsed unequivocally by representatives of the Federal Reserve Board before our committee. The quotation reads:

> Under the terms of the Federal reserve act the Federal reserve banks must maintain a 35 per cent reserve in gold or lawful money against their deposit liabilities and a reserve of 40 per cent in gold against their notes. On February 24, for instance, the reserves of the Federal reserve banks were $3,140,000,000; Federal reserve notes in actual circulation were $2,643,000,000 and deposits $1,973,000,000. The 35 per cent reserve against deposits would be $691,000,000 which would absorb all of the $202,000,000 of reserves other than gold and in addition $489,000,000 of gold, and the 40 per cent reserve against Federal reserve notes would be $1,057,000,000, so that the total reserve requirements would be $1,392,000,000. This figure represents the total amount of gold on which the Federal reserve system could base additional credit. On the basis of these excess reserves, the Federal reserve banks could issue $3,500,000,000 of credit, if the demand were for currency, and $4,000,000,000 if it were for deposits at the reserve banks. There is nothing in the new legislation that in any way changes these maximum amounts. It does, however, have an important bearing on the manner in which the extension of credit can be accomplished under the law.

It has been argued that the issual of these Treasury notes would drive other currency out of circulation. Doctor Goldenweiser, on page 748, refutes that argument decisively.

There is another argument that is thrown into the faces of those sponsoring this measure, and that is that it would unbalance the Budget. What Budget? Do you gentlemen refer to the 1931, 1932, or 1933 Budget? This bill was not enacted at the time when the 1931 Budget lacked $903,000,000 of being balanced on July 1, 1931. This bill is not now law at a time when the Budget for 1932 will fail by $3,000,000,000 of being balanced. Some say that it will unbalance the 1933 Budget. My friends, it does not touch the Budget for the year 1931, 1932, or 1933. The idea of unbalancing the Budget for the coming fiscal year, 1933, is nothing more nor less, in my opinion, than a smoke screen to prevent the American people from knowing that the Budgets for 1931 and 1932 lacked practically $4,000,000,000 of being balanced. In my opinion, the cry to "balance the Budget for the next fiscal year" is the affirmative action to exclude from view the fact that for the fiscal year next past, and the present fiscal year ending July 1, the administration of Mr. Hoover has failed to keep the faith of the American people—has failed to keep the Budget balanced. It is not the fear of the knowing business man that the Budget of 1933 may or may not be balanced that has impaired or destroyed his confidence in Government. In my judgment, it is the fact that this governmental business of 1931 and 1932 has been so managed as that their ends would not meet that has caused financial despair. But, this bonus legislation does not affect any budget of this country, top, side, or bottom. There is not one single penny to be taken from the Treasury of the United States under this measure; there is not one single penny of additional taxes to be levied to liquidate the obligations of the Federal Government already incurred—to change the nonnegotiable form of that obligation to the form of a negotiable obligation.

The adjusted-service certificates certainly are obligations of the Federal Government. Some say they are not yet due. To that I do not subscribe. The theory upon which the adjusted-service certificates were issued was, as their name implies, an adjustment of the service pay of the veterans of the World War. It was said that this adjustment should be an added dollar per day for domestic service and $1.25 per day for foreign service. This is what is known as a service credit. To it is added the sum of 25 per cent for the deferring of the payment until 1945. Undoubtedly, the theory of this adjusted-service certificate was the adjustment of the pay for services rendered. To what date did it relate—when the services were rendered, or some seven or eight years afterwards? Assume that there was a difference of opinion as to a contract between two individuals for services rendered. Litigation results, and the added pay is secured by judgment. Would not the judgment bear interest, at least from the time when the services ceased? Bring this rule into application in this case. Is not it fair to compute interest upon that sum, which evidences the adjustment in the pay of the soldier, from November 11, 1918, when the noise of battle ceased? Is not it more fair to begin then than to start the interest payment on January 1, 1925, six years thereafter? My friends, we have untold precedents wherein our Government pays interest upon indebtedness adjudged against it, dating back to the time when the obligation is created. One example is the tax refund. Uncle Sam collects more money than the taxpayer owes. The taxpayer is deprived of the use of that money and goes to the bureau, possibly the Board of Tax Appeals, and finally the refund is ordered. That money bears interest from the date of the payment by the taxpayer. Truly, billions of dollars have been refunded. Upon these billions, without question, the interest is computed from the date of the payment—the date when the adjustment should have been properly made.

So, considering the adjusted-service certificates, that which it is, an adjustment pay, it is fair to compute interest upon it from November 11, 1918; and when you do it, compounding it annually, as the Government is now compounding interest annually against the World War veterans on its loans to him, you will see that the face value of the adjusted-service certificates is due to-day. I say this upon the authority of figures submitted by the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I regret that the time allotted me will not permit me to yield.

But some say that the contract has been executed; that the rights of the Government and the soldiers were concluded with the adjusted compensation act of 1924. Let us see about this phase of the question. It is evident that it takes two people to make a contract. There must be a meeting of the minds. There must be agreement. The legislation of 1924 authorizing the issual of adjusted-service certificates was a one-sided bargain. The Government was the one speaking—the soldiery of the country never indorsed nor agreed to the contract before it was made nor afterwards. The bonus bill was brought to the floor of Congress under the rule that prohibited any amendment being offered from the floor. In consequence of which I say the matter is not concluded. In matters legislative dozens of times during a session of Congress do we see amendments to existing contracts and existing laws.

For illustration: This Nation loaned billions of dollars to its allies both before and after the armistice was signed. The nations at the time of receiving the loans executed agreement to pay. Some six or seven years thereafter the Congress of the United States went behind this obligation to pay, provided a debt commission, and a new debt agreement was reached. Thereby many billions of dollars were forgiven these foreign nations. My friends, the money forgiven was money procured from the American people, evidenced either by taxation or Government bonds sold to the people. The American Government approved the act of the Debt Commission and made a new contract with the foreign nations.

Again in 1919, or maybe in the early days of 1920, the transportation act came along, and in one section of it there was written what is commonly known as the "recapture clause," whereby moneys in excess of a reasonable yield were to be paid into a reserve fund of the carriers and to the Interstate Commerce Commission as a general railroad contingent fund. To-day there is more than $360,000,000 accumulated. All the railroads in the Nation affected are clamoring for the repeal of the recapture clause, and thereby return this sum of $360,000,000 to their treasury. It could well be said in connection with such legislation that the contract had been made and the matter concluded. But you and I know that laws are amended almost daily while Congress is in session, meeting changed conditions and doing that which the Congress deems to be right and proper. So, in this connection, there is nothing unusual about reopening the case or reforming the contract.

CONCLUSION

I have endeavored to develop my argument for this legislation upon the plane first indicated, and that was that we feel that this legislation is meritorious and highly advantageous to our Nation. It has been hard for us to refrain from answering criticisms hurled at World War veterans and Members of Congress sponsoring this legislation. Suffice for us to say that such critics, even Members of this body, when you impugn the motive of any Member espousing this cause, it may be that "They know not what they do." Any time in this body property rights will have valiant support. It is articulate with all the power that money and influence can put in motion. The metropolitan press heeds their importunities. When human rights become involved, then immediately the vested interests strike out, hitting in every direction all those who stand in their way.

Personally, in 1924, when the adjusted compensation bill was being considered, I voiced my desires for a payment in cash. I supported the measure that became law. In a former Congress, 1922, the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee strongly characterized the bill as a—

Due bill, rain check, borrowed money bonus mode of payment—an insult to every World War veteran, and shameful discredit to Congress and the Nation.

That report carried the information that the administration had paid more than $3,000,000,000 to war contractors, had given and loaned $2,000,000,000 to railroads, and millions to feed the hungry of Europe. There is never any argument about how to get money or where to get it when the direct interest of the big interests is involved. The Hamiltonian theory is to make successful those on top of the heap and some of their profits will percolate to the masses of the people.

Twenty-six billion dollars war expense, then $3,000,000,000 to war profiteers and $2,000,000,000 to the railroads immediately after the war, billions of dollars to European nations by way of war-debt reductions, and all the hundreds of millions recently paid out for other purposes certainly inclines me to the idea that this Nation could pay the adjusted-service certificates. Undoubtedly there is no reason why we could not adopt the method of refinancing herein suggested when these obligations now outstanding are due in major part, if not in whole—particularly when the refinancing is without cost of an added dime to the Treasury of the United States.

I trust that I have not been unduly exercised in the treatment of this matter. While I may refrain from fully expressing my attitude toward the human equation involved, I can not, in my mind and heart, forget the boys of yesterday who were the proud defenders of our flag. We have heard talked about the payment of $6,000,000,000 for their injuries and illnesses. As an economic proposition, how many billions of dollars has this country taken from them in their physical and mental inability to pursue their hopes and their ambitions?

In the majority report they go so far as to charge the soldier with $2 a day for his keep, endeavoring to bring his wage to the average for 1918. Every soldier who served in that man's army knows that by the time the insurance, the allotment, and a few proper credits were subtracted from the pay of the private the sum total of his monthly salary approached nothing. They did not serve for monetary reward. Patriotic fire stirred their breasts; love of country imbued them with a world-admired zeal. Nothing would be too good for them when they returned, they were told. America would ever be grateful. Now in a matter concerning which they are much interested their names would be defamed, their motives attacked. Before you attack them in this forum, boys, remember who they are—lest you forget; lest you forget! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair notify me when I have used 10 minutes, please?

Mr. Chairman, I am sure this House will agree with me that I am never intolerant of those who differ with me. I accord to each of them sincerity of purpose. As far as I am concerned, in the discharge of my public duty I must follow the dictates of my conscience and my judgment as to what is best for my country, for in this emergency I have placed the welfare of country above every other consideration. [Applause.]

I can not vote for this legislation because I believe it will work injury upon the country that we all love. In 1925, when this legislation was enacted, I signed a minority report urging that the $1 and $1.25 per day extra compensation be paid them in cash, because the country at that time could have financed it and could have paid it, and I felt then that if that was taken as a basis for issuing paid-up insurance policies due in 1945 the very conditions that confront us to-day would obtain. It would have been the part of wisdom to have paid in full at that time.

These adjusted-service certificates are not due until 1945. The contract between the Government and the veterans is to the effect that whatever extra compensation was due them on that basis would be used as a lump sum to purchase an insurance certificate due in 1945, just as they could have taken a like amount of money and purchased a paid-up insurance certificate from a private company. My friends, to-day there are hundreds and thousands of American citizens who have bought and paid for insurance policies in private companies, now paid up, who would be delighted to have them cashed to-day for the full amount of the certificate, but they can not get them paid because it is not in accordance with the contract.

I do not believe, with the economic condition of this country, the financial condition of the Treasury, with burdensome taxes laid upon the backs of the American people, that these certificates can now be paid when they are not due until 1945. If they are paid to-day the practical effect of it will be that the United States is paying our brave veterans in advance, and giving them two billion two hundred million more than was intended by Congress when the law was passed. I have the highest respect for our ex-service men. I have the kindliest feelings for them, and I have supported, up to date, all remedial legislation for their benefit, and have handled many of their claims, just as other Congressmen have, and have tried to assist them in their claims for compensation, hospitalization, and so forth. I believe it is the duty of the Government to care for its disabled soldiers and their dependents; but, in my judgment, the United States is measuring up fully to this responsibility. The appropriations for them for the next fiscal year will total a little over $1,000,000,000, or, in fact, 25 cents out of each dollar spent by the Federal Government goes to care for its ex-service men. The United States to-day appropriates yearly more for its disabled heroes and their dependents than Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and Germany combined. The last Congress passed a bill authorizing our ex-service men to borrow as much as 50 per cent of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates. Practically three-fourths of them have availed themselves of this privilege. Those who have borrowed 50 per cent on a 4 per cent discount basis on the face value of their certificates have been paid practically in full the dollar or dollar and a quarter a day extra compensation allowed them in the act of 1925—the basis for their paid-up adjusted-service certificates. I repeat—in my judgment, the Federal Government can not pay the remainder of these certificates in full to-day without irreparable injury to the people of the United States.

The proponents of this measure say the Government can pay it by issuing Treasury certificates and not add additional taxes. I myself believe that a fallacy. I am neither an economist nor a financier but must just use my common sense and my judgment in the discharge of my official duty. If I believed the Government could issue $2,400,000,000 of money and keep it at par throughout the world, I never would have voted to levy $1,118,000,000 additional taxes upon the American people. [Applause.] If that could have been done, why did we not issue Treasury certificates and pay the deficit? Yea, why not go further and issue four or five billion more and retire that much of the public debt and stop interest, and save the American taxpayers that much interest money? [Applause.]

My friends, I myself do not believe the Government of the United States can have any good money and maintain its financial integrity and the stability of its credit except by revenues collected from the people in the way of taxes. Under these conditions I can not and I will not vote for this legislation, because I do not believe it just to the masses of the American people who will have to pay the bill.

I am conscious, of course, that I can not change a single vote in this House. I also know that this bill will pass the House. What its fate will be in the Senate I know not, but I do know that if it reaches the President he will veto it [applause] and that it can not be passed over a veto.

I will not consume any more of the time. I desire to give it to other friends who are asking for it.

In conclusion let me say, just as those brave ex-service men were willing to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for country in time of war, in this time of great distress, of suffering by the masses of the people, greater than they underwent during the war, it will be but a small sacrifice for me to lay down my political life, if necessary, to serve my country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the World War veterans, or at least some of them, and I hope a small part, are under a double misapprehension. Many of the bonus marchers have come to Washington honestly believing that they are owed money by the Government of the United States. Furthermore, there are many veterans who believe that the Congress voted to give $2,000,000,000 to the big interests in America, to the banks, to the railroads, and to the insurance companies through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

In the first place, as was stated yesterday, the Government owes nothing to any able-bodied veteran in this country on his adjusted-service certificate until 1945.

In the second place, Congress, only a year or so ago, voted very properly to loan the veterans 50 per cent of the face value of their own policies in order to afford relief and help the World War veterans in their economic difficulties, and I urge that before Congress adjourns that the interest rates on these loans be reduced to 3 per cent.

As far as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is concerned—and I hope the reporters for the press will get this—the Government is not giving away any money to the big interests. We established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and empowered it to make loans and extend credit on good security, to railroads and to banks, but a very large percentage of the loans are going to maintain the solvency of the small banks throughout the country. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation authorities informed me this morning that 70 per cent of their loans went to small banks in cities with populations under 5,000. It went there to do what? To save the credit of the grocer, the butcher, the baker, the dairyman, and the farmer. It did not go to Morgan or Rockefeller or Wall Street or to the big interests, but to the people in need of loans in the smaller cities of America. That was the purpose of the bill, and that is how the bill is being carried out by a nonpartisan board in the interest of the American people. But for some reason many of the veterans are under the impression, probably due to vicious propaganda, that we are giving away money to the big interests, instead of requiring adequate security on all loans. The people back home are the ones that benefit most through the saving of small-town banks from financial disaster. The big banks very generally are solvent, liquid, and have plenty of money, but the smaller financial institutions need long-term credits in this national emergency.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, I can not yield. I wish I had time in my five minutes to answer the able speech of Mr. VINSON, the gentleman from Kentucky. Why haggle for months upon months about reducing expenditures, cutting down the salaries of Government employees and balancing the Budget if the principle the gentleman upholds is good?

Why not issue by aid of our printing presses one billion, five billions, or ten billions of dollars to pay off all our debts, to pay for our national defense, to balance the Budget, to provide for public works and unemployment relief? The same principle holds. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

I admit if we owe the veterans anything, it ought to be paid, not, however, through printing-press methods. We have always found ways and means to pay any just debt, and we are still able to do so. But we do not owe them anything, and therefore we should not call upon the Government to start the printing presses at this time to make fiat money and give away $2,000,000,000 to any particular group of citizens when we owe money right and left and are not able even to balance our own Budget in this financial and economic crisis. [Applause.] I want to make it abundantly clear that the American Legion, the largest and most important organization of World War veterans, is not in sympathy, directly or indirectly, with the demands that are being made for the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates in this national emergency. The following resolution adopted by the last national convention of the American Legion, held at Detroit last fall, speaks for itself in no uncertain terms:

Whereas the unqualified, generous, and unstinted relief of our disabled comrades has always been, and ever will be, the task to which the American Legion is chiefly dedicated, and is the surest path for "service to God and country"; and

Whereas the American Legion, having never demanded gratuity for the able, but now, as always, unrelenting and determined in its solicitations for succor by a grateful Government for those disabled in its service, protests any proposed economy at their expense; but

Whereas millions of men and billions of dollars and of property can not be destroyed except the survivors be called upon for sacrifice and self-denial to make good the laws which has visited "service-connected disability" upon all mankind; and

Whereas the Nation to-day faces an economic and financial crisis which calls for sound, unselfish, and patriotic action upon the part of all America: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, in full possession of its limitless faith in the destiny of the Nation we fought to preserve, calls upon the able-bodied men of America, rich and poor, veteran, civilian, and statesmen, to refrain from placing unnecessary financial burdens upon National, State, or municipal governments and to unite their efforts as they all did in 1917 to the end that the war against depression be victoriously concluded, prosperity and happiness restored.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I ever gave more intensive study and more thought to any proposition that has ever been presented to this House since I have been a Member of Congress than I have to this particular legislation. It is a matter that has troubled me as I know it has troubled every Member of this House regardless of what position he may take with reference to this legislation.

This bill is being discussed now, and was discussed yesterday by its opponents, from wrong premises. The bill neither requires the appropriation of one penny out of the Treasury of the United States, nor does it add one single additional obligation to the Government. [Applause.] If it did, then as one who has stood before this House during this entire session urging economy, I could not vote for it, because I do not think our Treasury is in a position to assume an obligation of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, I have been of the opinion for months and months, and have so expressed myself, that we are never going to have a return of anything like prosperity until something is done to bring down the value of gold so that commodities in the hands of producers may bring a fair and reasonable price to those who produce them. [Applause.] It is necessary, therefore, since all of the circulating medium, or at least a great portion of it is now in the vaults of the big banks of this country, to have more money, and I want to call attention to the fact that this was recognized by the President and was recognized by Congress when it passed at the President's instance and request and as one of his relief measures the Glass-Steagall bill. That bill provides that five or more banks may pool their securities and present them or United States bonds and secure currency thereon for their use. Where would that additional currency go? It would go where a great deal of the other currency now is. How many of the people of the country would secure any benefit from it? You have the same sort of security here, because even though these certificates may be small, they are as much a bond and an obligation of the Government as the bonds upon which it is proposed to secure additional currency under the Glass-Steagall bill, for which doubtless most of you voted.

Under this provision there follows, necessarily, the fact that when this additional currency is issued—and, mind you, it is to take up an existing obligation, not a new one—it will be widely and equally distributed throughout the United States; money goes in every city, in every town, in every hamlet, and in every community of this entire country. The people and not the banks become its beneficiaries. [Applause.]

The more I have studied this proposition the more positive I have become in my opinion that there has been no bill proposed here which will more surely serve to bring about that happy result—and, to my mind, that necessary result—the lowering of the value of gold and providing an increased value of commodities. [Applause.]

The House again recognized the need for additional currency when it passed the Goldsborough bill the other day, which would have the effect of directing Federal reserve banks to issue currency upon United States bonds for the purpose of bringing the value of the dollar down to what it was in 1926. The Senate Banking and Currency Committee also recognized this need for additional currency when the other day it unanimously indorsed the Glass amendment to this bill providing for an issue of currency based on United States bonds to the extent of one billion or more dollars. I repeat, the currency which would be issued under all these bills would be turned over in the first instance to the banks of the country. These soldiers hold the bonds of the Government, which are just as sacred as the bonds held by the banks. Why not therefore issue this currency to them and thus bring about its distribution among the people? The support given the bills referred to, which are primarily framed in the interest of banks, makes the objections urged to this bill untenable and ridiculous. Before we adjourn let us pass some legislation in the interest of the entire people and at the same time render relief and do justice to the veterans who fought in defense of their country.

Mr. Chairman, as a further expression of my views on this subject and under the leave granted me to extend my remarks, I wish to append herewith a statement which I recently issued for publication in my district stating my views upon this bill:

Would you vote to pay to the veterans at this time the balance due upon their adjusted-compensation certificates if you were satisfied that this would not entail any additional cost to the Government now or hereafter?

I think you would, especially if you were assured that it would actually save the Government $112,000,000 every year between now and 1945 and at the same time be a forward step toward the restoration of prosperity among all classes of our citizenship. If you will carefully read this statement I think you will agree that this would result.

Laying aside the fact that this is a debt which the Nation owes to the veterans and without regard to our feeling of gratitude for their service and sacrifice, I am going to present this matter from the standpoint of the benefit which will accrue to the entire citizenship as well as to the veterans themselves. There is a mistaken impression that it is proposed to pay this bonus out of revenues secured by taxation or by the issuance of additional bonds, and this understanding has caused most of the opposition to this measure.

I could possibly have saved myself from some public criticism had I announced my conclusions earlier. I have no sort of resentment against those who have so expressed themselves. I have always adhered to the policy of declining to declare myself for or against any particular measure until I know just what I will be called to vote upon. Bills are frequently changed in committee, and the progress of this bill is an illustration of that fact. A first draft and then a second draft of the bill was introduced and it is now proposed to substitute a third draft, which was really prepared by Senator Robert Owen, who was one of the authors of the Federal reserve act, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate when he was a Member of that body, and recognized then and now as one of the most thorough students of finance in the entire country.

I did not sign the petition for the discharge of the Committee on Rules from the consideration of the so-called Patman bonus bill. I have always consistently declined to sign such petitions on any and all subjects for a number of reasons. The House is now called upon, however, to vote upon the question of discharge, and, after as thorough study as I have ever given to any question since I have been in Congress, I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty to vote to discharge the committee and to pass the bill. The bills which have heretofore been passed have been in the nature of preventive as well as temporary relief measures. This bill will not only give relief to those who served the country in time of need but it will at the same time hold out to every class of our citizenship hope for the future.

I voted against the bonus when it was first passed. I said then, when there was a large surplus each year in the Treasury, that since it was being proposed as adjusted compensation to the veterans for past services it should be paid in cash rather than by a certificate due 20 years hence. Under the terms of this bill, the Government will pay an existing indebtedness by the issuance of Treasury notes. It is apparent, of course, that this money when issued will be widely distributed and give quick relief to every city, town, hamlet, and community in the country rather than merely to those who are able to borrow from banks, heretofore the first beneficiaries of additional currency. It is said by some that it will be quickly dissipated. The record of the last payment does not show this, but if this be true the fact remains that the merchants, and others with whom the veterans deal, will share in this benefit.

If there is no need for additional currency, why did Congress at the earnest request of the President, recently pass the Glass-Steagall bill? That bill authorizes five or more banks to pool their securities and deposit them in Federal reserve banks as security for Federal reserve bank notes. And why did the Senate Banking and Currency Committee a few days ago unanimously recommend the Glass amendment authorizing additional currency to be issued upon United States bonds, limited only by the amount of bonds outstanding and the amount of capital stock of the institutions, and which, it is said, will amount to $1,000,000,000? All of this new currency would be issued to the banks to be loaned to their customers, provided they possess the necessary collateral. Many of the veterans can not borrow from the banks. That is particularly true of the disabled and the vast number of unemployed. But they hold the obligation of the Government; small it is true, but just as much a bond as those for larger amounts. If, therefore, it is sound finance to issue additional currency to the banks upon such security, why does it become unsound finance when it is proposed to issue currency direct to the veterans upon acknowledged obligations of the Government, and which will be backed not only by the credit of the United States but with 40 per cent of gold reserve behind it, which is the maximum required by the law?

I do not subscribe, therefore, to the theory of those who oppose payment of these certificates. This is not creating a new Government obligation, but merely converting an existing Government obligation, and will not result in hurtful inflation. On the contrary, it will increase currency expansion and circulation equally in all parts of the United States, bring a halt to the deflation, and a quick rise in prices of all kinds. The gold dollar has increased so much in value that everything one possesses was worth from two to twenty times more four years ago than it is now. Debts were created which are now two to four times greater by reason of this increase in the value of gold. Five-cent cotton, 50-cent wheat, 30-cent corn and tobacco, and other commodities selling in proportion can not pay these debts and taxes and bring prosperity. It is like requiring the debtor to pay 400 bales of cotton where he owes 100 bales, 40,000 bushels of wheat for 10,000 bushels, 400 hogshead of tobacco instead of 100 borrowed.

But to meet the criticism of possible inflation the Owen bill provides for the issuance of United States 3½ per cent bonds to an amount which will equal the Treasury notes issued and which will be placed in the various Federal reserve banks to be held as agent or custodian of the Government. These bonds will draw no interest unless the purchasing power of the dollar shall fall below its average value in 1926. The Federal Reserve Board in such event will have the right to dispose of a sufficient number of these bonds and thus contract the currency to a point where the dollar will be worth what it was in that year, when everybody was prosperous.

I submit, therefore, that the possibility of undue inflation by the issuance of this additional currency can not possibly arise under the provisions of this bill. The Federal Reserve Board is vested with the authority and the power in advance to see that this does not occur.

I have heard from some who say they would have no objection if the bill was confined to disabled and needy unemployed veterans. But since the Government has entered into this obligation with all the veterans, why should this plan not be followed by the Government to pay its debts and at the same time afford the additional currency which is needed to bring down the value of the dollar. No one has ever questioned the patriotism of these ex-service men. I, for one, do not believe that those who do not actually need the money will cash their certificates.

These are some of the reasons which have induced me to determine to support the bill providing for the immediate payment of these certificates.

I have not suddenly become aroused in the interest of the veterans for the purpose of securing their support—presuming on a service which was rendered far from the battlefield. I have been his active friend all along. Thousands of them over the district and the State will attest to this fact. I have never felt that the country wanted to economize at the expense of the disabled soldier or his dependent widow and children. I have devoted more of my time to veterans and their individual problems than I have to any other requests which have been brought to my attention. This has also been true of my entire office force, and it has been our genuine pleasure as well as our duty to do so. I have never turned down or neglected a single case, and whenever possible I have taken it personally to the bureau rather than by correspondence, and have endeavored to render real service rather than mere lip service.

Questions of this kind should not be settled as a matter of sentiment. But let me tell of a visit which I made a few days ago to one of the camps of the veterans who have unwisely come to Washington for the purpose of securing payment of their certificates. There are said to be 10,000 in Washington to-day—and more of them are on the way. It was a foolish trip and one which should not have been undertaken; but they are here. My visit was in the early hours of the morning, and I saw grim, gaunt men—some of them with distinguished-service crosses upon their shirts—eating their breakfast. These veterans had slept all night in a river-bottom field without shelter. I saw them dipping into a large tin can, placing what appeared to be thin gruel upon tin or broken plates, from which they ate without spoon or fork. I asked some of these boys why they had come to Washington on a trip of this kind when it was evident to everyone that it would do no good. Their reply was that they had no jobs at home and they were as well off here in Washington as anywhere else. Many of them told me that they had served in France, and one of them, reaching into his trousers pocket, drew therefrom a soiled and crumpled certificate issued within the last two years and said, "This is all I have in the world, and surely my Government which I served during the war will pay it to me now when I so badly need it in order to provide myself with necessary food and clothing."

I looked at these men—disheveled, gaunt, and hungry—and my mind went back to those day of nineteen seventeen and eighteen, when these same men as healthy, ruddy-cheeked young boys answered the call of their country. I could see them again as they marched under the colors to the music of bands and the applause of grateful citizens, admiring friends, and neighbors on their way to war. I recalled their ready response and their willingness to sacrifice their lives, if need be, in defense of this Nation. I felt that surely no one who could see these men as I saw them would feel otherwise than that this Government should extend its helping hand to them and pay to them—many of them disabled and all of them needy and unemployed—the sum which it promised to pay them in 1925.

True, the certificates are not due until 1945, but the Government frequently issues new certificates to take up obligations not yet due. And it will cost the Government nothing additional in this instance. On the contrary, it will by so doing actually save $112,000,000 every year until 1945, for that sum is put each year in our National Budget to create a sinking fund to take up these certificates when they fall due in 1945.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I believe every Member of this House knows that I saw service during the World War. I have in my possession an adjusted-service certificate in the amount of more than $1,300 as a result of that service. I am a veteran of the Spanish-American War. I preface my remarks by this statement with the hope that every Member present, every ex-service man in the gallery, and everyone within the sound of my voice will recognize the fact that I am a friend of the ex-service man. [Applause.] I have voted for every proposition that has been before this House since I have been a Member of it that has in any way contributed to the welfare and the benefit of the ex-service men and their dependents. I made no exception to that rule when I voted yesterday not to take this bill from the Committee on Rules.

I think there has been nothing proposed either by the ex-service men or their friends that will do so much to injure the ex-service men and their dependents as the enactment of the bill that is before the House to-day. [Applause.] There are from eight to ten millions unemployed in this country. Not more than 1,000,000 of these are World War veterans. The man who stands here and argues that these veterans only should be selected for help from among all these other needy is, in my judgment, doing not only an injustice to the great army of unemployed but an injury to the ex-service men themselves. If there was some way by which only the ex-service man, desperately in need of funds, could be given some further relief than that he already has, and if this bill provided for that exclusively, there might be some excuse for its being before the House. However, that can not be done and every Member of the House knows it can not be done.

We have just passed a bill that will tax the people an additional $1,200,000,000. We are cutting the Government expense to the point where some necessary governmental activities will be seriously crippled. We do all this to put our country upon a pay-as-you-go basis. We do it to restore the confidence of our people in their Government. We do it to give the greatest possible encouragement for an early recovery of business, that jobs may be had by all. Jobs are needed and must be had if we are going to have a return to prosperity; jobs not alone for the ex-service man but jobs for everybody. This can not be brought about by thrusting still further burdens on the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country. Every Member ought to know that if we pass this bill and it should become a law there will be an ever-growing demand that benefits now given the veterans and their dependents be repealed. Already more than 26 per cent of all Federal revenues are expended for their benefit. This is testimonial to the patriotism and gratitude of a generous people.

The burden upon the taxpayers is already great. Many are beginning to complain because veterans whose disabilities are in no way connected with their service are being pensioned by the Government. Demands are already being made upon Congress to confine these gratuities to those who are suffering because of their service.

In this House within the past few weeks we passed the Rankin bill to pension to widows and dependent children of veterans who died from causes not connected with their service. That bill has not been enacted into law. In my judgment the present demand for the bonus has delayed and will further delay its enactment, notwithstanding the distressful conditions under which thousands of these widows and children are now compelled to live. The ex-service men of the country should agree that help for the needy widows and children should be their first concern; that nothing shall be done to jeopardize this.

Their next concern should be the welfare of their disabled comrades. Under laws passed by Congress and now upon the statute books these are all receiving their monthly checks from the Treasury of the United States. Nothing should be done that will result in taking from the needy disabled men the help they are now receiving.

The attempt to pass this bill at this time is a great mistake. Even the proponents of the bill know it can not and will not become the law. Notwithstanding this, encouragement has been given the veterans which has resulted in the so-called bonus march. Thousands are encamped here under conditions which endanger not only their own lives but the lives of the people living in this community as well. An epidemic is imminent. Already the available beds in the hospitals of the city are filled. Temporary hospitals are being provided. It may easily become a tragedy.

These men have been led to believe that their adjusted certificates constitute a promise to pay now due. Every Member of this House knows this is not true. Every man of us knows the due date is just 20 years from the day the certificate is issued. It is under a misunderstanding that these veterans are congregating here, and this misunderstanding is due to the preaching of those who know better.

Mr. BYRNS, the great economy leader of this House and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has just made a most astounding statement. He says this will not be a charge upon the people of the United States and will not be a charge upon the Treasury. For the life of me I can not understand how there can be created something from nothing. Money is supposed to, and does, represent some value. If we are going to create money with which to pay the veterans by starting the printing presses, why do we not do the same thing for all the expenses of Government? Why tax the people for anything? Why not pay all the government expense in the same way? Of course it is ridiculous to argue that we can create money by starting the printing presses to pay the bonus and can not create money to pay the expenses of government by the same method. [Applause.]

In 1920 the national debt was in round numbers $26,000,000,000. During the 10 prosperous years following we were able to pay all the running expenses of the Government and to also reduce the national debt by $10,000,000,000. In 1929 came the depression and with it such a reduction of corporation and individual incomes that income tax and other receipts fell to a point where we could not meet the expenses of Government without increasing the national indebtedness. The national debt on May 31, this year, was $19,036,916,000, an increase of approximately three billions over the low of 1930. We are faced with a deficit of more than two billions this year. As I have stated before, we are now taking the steps to balance the Budget and get on a pay-as-you-go basis. To do this it has been necessary to spread $1,200,000,000 taxes on an already overburdened people. In the face of all this, it must be apparent that we can not pay the bonus without either still further taxing our people or still further increasing the national debt. Oh, I know there are those who argue that the issuance of fiat money through working the printing presses overtime does not constitute a charge against either the people or the Treasury, but I want to remind you that each certificate so issued is, and will so state on its face, a promise to pay. To be paid by whom? Why, by the people, of course.

Mr. Chairman, this country, along with the other countries of the world, has been passing through most trying times during the past three years. Approximately 5,000 banks have failed, entailing tremendous losses to depositors and others everywhere throughout the land. Business is at a standstill; there is unemployment everywhere; the people are already taxed almost more than they can bear. To pass this bill is to add immeasurably to those tax burdens and to so further disturb our financial and business structures as to seriously retard, if not actually delay, a return to normal conditions, with its reemployment and rising prices, for months and perhaps years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, try as I might to bring myself to a favorable decision upon this bill, I have been unable to do so. [Applause.] I do feel this measure should be disposed of one way or the other to-day, and for that reason I voted yesterday to discharge the Committee on Rules from the further consideration of the rule. Thousands of veterans are in Washington awaiting our decision, and we should have the courage to meet the vote that has been forced upon us. The veterans have been misled, and they will resent it in the end.

My record in supporting veterans' legislation and assisting them is perfect. By that I mean that I have consistently supported legislation affecting the man who suffered from disabilities, and I have also favored legislation that would provide for the widows and orphans of the veterans who have passed away. It has always been the policy of our Government to take care of those who responded to the call when needed, and, in my opinion, that policy will always be adhered to. My office resembles a branch office of the Veterans' Bureau. Thousands of claims have been called to my attention by veterans and their friends, and it has been my pleasure to help them to receive recognition, provided they were entitled to benefits under the law. I shall continue as I have in the past to serve them at every opportunity.

I was the first Member of Congress to introduce a bill to provide for the payment of a part of the adjusted-service certificates. At that time there was nearly $1,000,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the adjusted-service certificate fund.

The then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, opposed my bill, but in the end a law was passed and the veterans were able to borrow one-half of the face value of their certificates.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is not sound. It provides for the printing of currency or Treasury notes, which means the same, because the notes shall be full legal tender, non interest bearing, exempt from all taxes, including Federal, State, and subdivisions thereof. There are no provisions to raise this money by taxation or in any other way—the bill simply provides to print money until a sufficient amount is available to pay the adjusted-service certificates, and this will mean a total of not less than $2,400,000,000.

The committee considering this bill states that to-day we have outstanding $5,400,000,000. To-day we have silver, gold, and Government securities back of every dollar of our currency, and the world knows our money is secured by silver, gold, and Government securities. The contention of the financial experts of the Government, including the members of the Ways and Means Committee, who signed this report, is the issue of the $2,400,000,000 would amount to an immediate inflation in our currency of almost 45 per cent.

I can not vote for a bill which might in the end jeopardize the value of the currency of this country. [Applause.] If we followed the policy that is proposed in this legislation and printed money whenever there was a demand for it with nothing behind it, it would not be long before it would take a handful of dollar bills to buy a package of cigarettes. [Applause.]

The European nations that resorted to such methods found such a system disastrous. As I understand the situation every dollar of the $5,400,000,000 in currency now in circulation would be reduced in value almost one-half. Why, the dollar that the veterans would receive under the provisions of this bill would be worth only 50 or 60 cents. It is too dangerous a precedent. When the veterans learn what would really happen under this bill there will not be one man in ten who would even consider such a measure.

I have introduced a bill to pay the bonus in full, but there is something back of my bill. It has been adversely reported by this committee, the same committee that reported adversely on the Patman bill. My bill provides for the issuance of bonds, but it specifically provided in my bill that the money to retire the bonds shall be raised by taxation, and the tax I propose would not only help the veterans but would help the entire country, and there would be no objection from the people of this country; that is, the people who would pay the tax. My bill will not in any way affect the value of the dollar, because the money to retire the bonds, the money to pay the interest, is to be raised by taxation.

My proposed plan provides for a tax upon beer. The money raised in this way to be used solely to retire the bonds which are issued to pay off the adjusted-service certificates. [Applause.]

It is my purpose to offer my bill as a substitute for the pending bill. Again I say my bill is sound, because it provides a way to retire the bonds. The Patman bill has no method whatever for retiring the money that it seeks to print.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the membership of the House will get a copy of my bill (H. R. 11117) and study the measure. It will meet the situation. It will not only help the veterans by paying the adjusted-service certificates in full in dollars worth 100 cents, but it will provide work for the veterans. What the veteran needs to-day more than money is a job, and if we could provide a job for him he would not be asking for money. [Applause.] The veteran wants work so he can support his family; and if he had work, he would not be asking you to pay the certificates now.

Mr. Chairman, at no time since I have been a Member of this House have I thought of my political future in voting upon proposed legislation, and I do not propose to think of my political future to-day. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the misconception that obtains with reference to this proposed legislation is really very regrettable. This misconception is abroad throughout the country.

The misconception goes to the proposition, first, that the veterans are here to intimidate the Members of Congress to vote for this legislation; and, second, that it is a graft and a steal, or a raid upon the Treasury, and that it will not only unbalance the Budget but will require the levy of additional taxes in the amount of money to be paid out under this legislation.

I want to give it as my personal opinion that the veterans have not intimidated a single Member of the Congress; in fact, I believe they have hurt rather than helped their cause by coming here in large numbers.

The only semblance of intimidation that has come to me is that which has come from the business men and the citizens of my district who do not understand the purport or the purpose of this bill and have been misled into believing that it is a raid upon the Treasury.

Such is not the case. It should be made plain at the outset that the sponsors of this legislation have taken the position that the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in full at this time only if it can be done advantageously to the United States and to the betterment of the economic status of the country. The proposition of such payment does not call for a single dollar of appropriation out of the Treasury or for the levying of additional taxes, and in no way affects the Federal Budget. Succinctly stated, the plan of payment is to deliver to the soldier a circulating obligation of the Government—Treasury notes—in exchange for the noncirculating obligation of the Government—the adjusted-service certificates.

If you would consider this measure from the standpoint of the welfare of the people of the country at large you would be getting down to the real issue presented by this legislation. Those of us who are supporting this legislation are supporting it upon a broader basis than merely relief to the ex-service men. We recognize the fact that they themselves are entitled to relief, yet if this legislation could not be justified upon a broader basis than that, we do not feel we would be justified in coming here in support of it.

It would require about $2,400,000,000 of Treasury notes to pay these certificates in full. The payment of these certificates in this way would place more than $2,000,000,000 of actual money in circulation and the money would be distributed to every nook and corner of the country and would immediately enter the channels of trade. It would not be piled up in the banks to be added to the moneys already hoarded therein. The ex-service men constitute about 3 per cent of the entire population of the country and they are distributed throughout the country in about that percentage. It has been charged that this bill proposes to issue fiat or printing-press money without anything back of it to maintain its parity. I want to say to you that the man who says that this is a bill to start the printing presses to work on a blank piece of paper does not understand the bill. These Treasury notes would be real money, worth 100 cents on the dollar. The gold reserve in this country is about four and one-half billion dollars. This gold does not circulate but is held in the vaults of the Treasury and the Federal reserve system purely as a reserve basis for currency issues. There is outstanding $5,400,000,000 of money of all kinds outside of gold, including silver coins, silver certificates, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, and United States Treasury notes. The national-bank notes and the silver certificates have no gold reserve whatever back of them. The legal gold reserve for Federal reserve notes is 40 per cent. Taking that percentage of reserve as the basis, there is sufficient gold reserve to back the issuance of $10,000,000,000 in currency.

The gold standard act of March 14, 1900, makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain all moneys issued or coined by the United States at a parity with the value of the gold dollar.

It is evident, therefore, that the necessary volume of Treasury notes to pay the adjusted-service certificates in full would have the strong backing of more than 40 per cent gold reserve and the authority of the gold standard act for maintaining such currency on a parity with the gold standard unit of value. Former Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma, the author of the Federal reserve act, said with reference to the bonus bill that the issuance of United States Treasury notes for payment of the bonus would be supported by the full powers of the United States Government and by all the gold available in this country. Hence the Treasury notes so issued would not be fiat money. It would be gold-standard money, and the payment of such certificates thus made would not increase the tax burden, would not call for any appropriation out of the Treasury of moneys collected from taxes, and would not in any way disturb the Federal Budget.

With this statement as a basis, I wish to direct your attention to the purely economic aspects of the bill. In doing so, I ask you to lay aside your prejudice and just look at it from the standpoint of the economic interest of the country generally. The bonus bill was not considered by the Committee on Ways and Means and by the witnesses who appeared at the hearings thereon merely as a matter of relief to the ex-service men, but 90 per cent of the evidence at the hearings had to do with the broader aspects of the bill, namely, the opportunity afforded for giving needed expansion to actual circulating money to be distributed throughout every community of the country.

I ask you, therefore, to consider the bonus legislation in that light. It is a universally recognized fact that this country can not get back to prosperity until farm-commodity prices are raised to their normal level. It is also recognized that farm-commodity prices are governed by the supply of circulating money and the supply of credit which circulates as money. When money and credit are scarce farm-commodity prices are low. When money and credit are plentiful farm-commodity prices are high. The purchasing power in the people is measured by the price they receive for their commodities. When there is no purchasing power in the great mass of the people all business enterprises are paralyzed. I am sure that you will recognize the fact that there is practically no circulating credit at this time and also that the volume of circulating money has so decreased that it is impossible to find sufficient money for the transaction of the ordinary business of commerce. With $40,000,000,000 of circulating credit wiped out of existence and more than half of the outstanding money hoarded, it is readily apparent what is the matter with commerce. Economists and business men all agree that a restoration of farm-commodity prices to a normal level is absolutely necessary to the return of prosperity and they agree also that the only way in which to bring about this restoration of commodity prices is to increase the volume of circulating money and of circulating credit.

Dr. E. A. Goldenweiser, director of research and statistics of the Federal Reserve Board, testified before the Ways and Means Committee on the question of the volume of outstanding money and the proportion thereof that is actually circulating as follows:

I have some figures here that will interest you. They show that of the five and a half billion dollars of currency outstanding, there is about $750,000,000 in the banks, and about $1,250,000,000 probably still in hoards accumulated in the past 18 months, and about $500,000,000 also in hoards but not created in this panic; just ordinary hoards, people having a little nest egg tucked away. There are about three hundred millions that are abroad, of which one hundred millions are in Cuba and two hundred millions in other countries, and about $100,000,000 has been destroyed. So that the total amount of money that does not do any actual business is $2,900,000,000 and the active money is about $2,500,000,000.

Irving Fisher, professor of economics, Yale University, said before the Ways and Means Committee:

I know you are a committee, not on banking and currency but on ways and means; but the ways and means of balancing the Budget are, first, to reflate. You can not tax a vacuum. You have got to have something to tax. You have got to restore prosperity. You have got to increase the income of the people. And all of these things that I have described, by which, through deflation, you have bankruptcies and unemployment and depression of trade, and all the rest, are reversed the instant you have reflation.

Professor Fisher said before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House:

I heard one of the leading bankers—I wish I had permission to quote him, but I do not want to do anything I am not authorized to do—the president of one of the largest banks in one of our largest cities, and the chairman of one of the most important committees of the American Bankers' Association, say that we must raise the price level to let people pay their debts and that if we do not he fears that the whole capitalistic system is going to collapse. He was willing to raise the price level by changing the weight of the dollar.

Professor Fisher further said:

We need first to raise the price level to enable debtors to pay their creditors on as just a basis to both as practicable, and, secondly, thereafter to stabilize the price level. The raising of the price level must be done either (a) by increasing the circulating medium or (b) by increasing its activity or velocity, which means, in particular, reducing hoarding. The circulating medium may be increased in many ways, the United States may issue new United States notes in purchase of United States bonds or in purchase of silver or anything else or paying its employees.

Our economic troubles are curable if we have the courage to apply a heroic remedy. Nothing but money will banish a panic. Money is the mudsill of credit and the foundation of confidence.

Doctors Pearson and Warren, of Cornell University, say:

Economic troubles are not acts of Providence any more than polluting a stream with typhoid is an act of Providence. Both are acts of man, and can be remedied when there is sufficient knowledge.

Dr. Wilfred I. King, of New York University, says:

Prices are determined by the standard of value. The standard of value is purely a man-made institution. The result is we can do anything we wish with the price level.

Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, says:

It should be clear that deflation or dollar swelling is not an act of God with a special mandate to baffle the human race. We do not have to wait for a happy accident to neutralize deflation. It may be neutralized by design. Man has control of his own currency, if he will but use it.

It is agreed on all hands that we must have reflation of farm-commodity prices before prosperity can return. The question is how are we going to bring this about. According to Doctor Goldenweiser we have only $2,500,000,000 of money circulating. The fact is we do not have more than $15 per capita in actual circulation. This bonus money would increase the per capita circulation 125 per cent and farm prices proportionately. This proposed legislation provides a convenient opportunity to the Government to discharge an obligation which will place in circulation more than two billions of dollars of actual money and retire the adjusted-service certificate obligations in an equal amount. In other words, this bonus legislation provides a convenient vehicle for conveying into the arteries of commerce a necessary flow of new money to stimulate trade and commercial activity and start the country on the upgrade toward normal economic conditions. This is the only measure which this Congress has considered that will jar the wheel of industry off of its dead center and start it to turning.

The big moneyed powers are opposing this bill not in the interest of the great body of the people but in their own selfish interest. The big banking interests are opposed to the issuance of money by the United States Government. They want to retain the exclusive privilege of issuing currency. For this reason the big moneyed powers have issued the edict that this bill must be killed. They have, through false propaganda, deliberately deceived the country as to the purpose and effect of this bill. They are money merchants.

The higher the value of the dollar the more secure they are in the control of the economic life of the country. I heard the testimony of their representatives before the Ways and Means Committee. They themselves offer no remedy for existing conditions. They say in effect, "Let the people sweat it out." It is time the people realize that no legislative progress favorable to them has ever been accomplished in America without the sneers and opposition of Wall Street. The Wall Street bankers want to keep a tight grip of control on the volume of the currency of the country, and they are afraid of losing that control if currency expansion is not left wholly to them.

The deceptive propaganda broadcast against this proposed legislation has caused many people to express opposition to this bill in perfect good faith but in absolute ignorance of what it means to them and to the economic condition of the country generally. I know this bill and what it means. I know who are opposing it and why. I am supporting this measure because of my firm faith in the beneficial results which will flow from it in restoring prosperity to our distressed land. In all sincerity, I could not do otherwise.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the demand for the payment of these certificates, the claim has been repeatedly made that the Government owes this money to the veterans now. I do not intend to discuss that now, except to say that it can not be sustained.

Running all through this discussion is the charge that the United States has not dealt fairly with its veterans of the World War.

On Monday of last week the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a compilation of figures showing that the United States now pays annually to the World War veterans a total of more than that paid to the veterans of Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Canada combined.

Taking that set of figures as a basis, I asked the Veterans' Administration to compile the table I now have here on the blackboard. I call your attention to these two columns at this end of the board.

We are now paying annually to the veterans of the World War $180.91 per capita, based on the total mobilized forces during the war period. Compare that with the figures, and you find that Germany pays $22.98; France pays $34.09; Great Britain, $26.49; Italy, $12.44; and Canada, $98.64.

Now, take the other figures, and we are annually paying $2,668.66 per capita, based on the number of those killed and wounded during the war. Of course, they alone are not the beneficiaries of those payments. Germany pays $48.87;

France, $50.99; Great Britain, $58.27; Italy, $43.74; and Canada, $263.41. Those figures are based upon our battle casualties.

Canada is the highest, and it pays only 10 per cent per capita of what is paid by the United States.

Total per capita payments to veterans of all nations since the war are now available. Based on the total men mobilized, the United States has paid her veterans of the World War $1,107.14, while Canada has paid over $1,533.16. But based on the number of men dead and wounded, the United States has paid over $16,331.79 per capita since the war, as against Canada's payment of $4,094.03. The United States figures used here and in the table do not include any part of the loans on the adjusted-compensation certificates.

These figures ought to give this Congress and the country serious thought as to whether or not the World War veterans have not been well cared for, and whether or not they have not been well treated.

Demagogues on the floor of this House and elsewhere have repeatedly told the veteran he is not being well treated, that the Government owes him money, and that he should have it. Here are the figures, authenticated, based on facts, that our Government now is doing more for its veterans than all of the nations named in that list combined. [Applause.] Gentlemen, when you go back to your veterans and to your taxpayers, take these figures with you. Tell them the facts of the loyalty, the generosity, and the fairness of your Government and mine toward the veteran. Then, again, may I say to my comrades among the veterans, as I did briefly yesterday, that this table ought to tell the veterans themselves to stop in their demands on the Treasury. When the taxpayers of the country find out the sums that Congress has paid and the amount that is being incessantly and constantly demanded by minority groups within the veterans, and by those nonveterans who curry political favor from veterans, the situation may develop in this country again that developed following the Revolutionary and the Civil Wars, when the Nation demanded and secured a purging of the pension rolls.

At the present time 852,000 veterans or their dependents are receiving monthly checks from the Government. Only the able-bodied veteran is not. Deny this bill and you ask the able-bodied veteran to remain on a parity with the 120,000,000 nonveteran citizenship of this country. Pass it and you single out for special benefits the able-bodied veteran from among our whole people.

Gentlemen, study those figures before you vote. [Applause.]

The table used in this statement follows:

[1]That portion of Veterans' Administration appropriations made applicable to World War veterans for fiscal year 1932.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. We are called on to-day to vote for H. R. 7726, to provide for the immediate payment to the veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates. It has been estimated that this would cost the Government about $2,400,000,000. This is more than half the cost of running the Government in 1932–33. And by this bill the Secretary is authorized to have engraved and printed a sufficient amount of Treasury notes with full legal tender. In other words, the printing presses are to be started and are to print these Treasury bills with which to pay the soldiers their so-called bonus.

I understand an amendment will be offered to the bill to provide for the issuance of Government bonds to back up this so-called "fiat" currency or "bonus" bill.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind, voting for this bill is like trying to cure a cancer with a plaster. We are told such a measure would give us the required amount of inflation of currency to rescue us from the depression. I believe that within four weeks, if the bill should become a law, the effect of this hypodermic of currency inflation will have exhausted itself and the body politic will lapse back into a far worse condition than it is in to-day, and the bill would dig deeper the abyss of depression in which we now find ourselves.

There would be a flush of spending of bonus money. But once the money is spent the effect will have gone and we all shall then be poorer for the experience.

There will be no lasting results, except the misery and the suffering that currency inflation and fiat money always bring.

I would be glad to pay this bonus immediately if the Government had the money and if it could be done without affecting disastrously the economic status of the country, if it could be accomplished without fiat money. But economists, experts, and Government officials who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee testified that the issuance of this fiat money to pay the soldiers would bring greater economic disaster upon the country and plunge many more people into suffering and privation.

We are told that this bill would aid unemployment. I fail to see how it would. We are told it would aid the veterans unemployed. But of the total army of unemployed only 13 per cent are veterans. Would it not be highly unfair to discriminate against the other 87 per cent of the unemployed who are nonveterans? Would they not be entitled to consideration? What about the small storekeeper, the butcher, the grocer, the plumber, the carpenter, the druggist, the lawyer, the doctor, and the housewife, who were not soldiers and who would not participate in the bonus. They would, however, have to pay their share of the bonus by taxes now or in years to come.

The bonus will cost $2,400,000,000. It would be given to the rich as well as the poor, the sick as well as the healthy, the employed soldier and the unemployed soldier. Every veteran must be treated alike. You can not give to one and withhold from another. Yet only 30 per cent of the veterans are unemployed. Therefore, here you would be giving 70 per cent of $2,400,000,000, or $1,680,000,000, to veterans who do not need the money since they have jobs. Nobody can defend his vote for the bonus on this basis.

It is argued that we should pay the face value of these certificates, because the holder needs the money. I have shown that only 30 per cent of the veterans are idle. Certainly, we can not justify a demand for the payment of the money to anybody just because the money is needed by a single class of the population.

If this payment would give relief generally to all the needy veterans and nonveterans, I would vote for it at every sacrifice.

By passing this bill, we discriminate between the veteran needy and the nonveteran needy. Rather let us adopt a policy of Federal relief for all those who are in want, without discrimination. If there is to be a dole, let us give it to the poor and unemployed of all classes.

WILLING TO PAY BONUS CERTIFICATES TO DATE

I am in favor of paying the exact amount that we owe the veterans to date. This bill would be paying them what will be the total in 1945, 13 years hence. When we passed the original bonus bill on May 17, 1924, we provided for a 20-year endowment policy, as it were, in the nature of an adjusted-compensation certificate, and on this endowment policy the Government was to pay the premium. It was in the nature of an additional compensation to be paid to the veteran for service during the World War. They were to receive $1 a day for service in the United States and $1.25 a day for service overseas. Since the per diem payment was to be deferred, in the form of this endowment policy, to 1945, the Government added an additional 25 per cent of the total per diem allowance. If living in 1945, the full amount of the certificate, with duly accrued interest, will be paid to the soldier. If he die in the interim, his dependents would receive the full amount in the nature of death benefits on the endowment policy.

The Government, in order to pay the amount on the certificates, with accrued interest, in 1945, agreed to build up a fund therefor by paying yearly $112,000,000.

In 1931 we revised the act to enable the veterans to borrow up to 50 per cent of the face value of their certificates. Up to March 31, 1932, the Government loaned on these certificates $1,386,828,621.21. There had already been paid, up to March 31, 1932, in death benefits $127,476,431. Therefore the Government has paid out to date on adjusted-compensation certificates, according to the acts of 1924 and 1931, $1,514,305,052.21. Comparatively few veterans have not borrowed on their certificates.

These certificates have run seven years. They have still 13 years to run. There are still 13 years of unaccrued interest; that is, from 1932 to 1945. That interest on these certificates has not been earned. The amount of this unearned interest is $1,353,000,000. If we pass this Patman bill we give the veterans this interest which has not as yet been earned. It amounts to almost as much as the per diem allowance figures to date. In other words, it is proposed to make another charge against the people of the United States almost equal to the original face value of the bonus certificates. That is highly unjust.

I am willing to subscribe to the proposition that we pay the veterans the face amount of the bonus, that is, the per diem allowance plus the interest accrued to date—to 1932. I would be willing to give the veterans the present-day face value of the certificates, which is another way of saying it. There would, of course, be deducted from the face value plus the accrued interest to 1932 whatever the veteran has borrowed.

To pay these bonus certificates, less the amounts already borrowed, would require about $773,000,000. To this extent I shall go, but not beyond it. It would be difficult enough to raise this money. It would have to be done by the sharpest economy in all Government bureaus rather than by additional taxation. I would cut to the bone expenditures in all bureaus and cut down armaments to the *n*th degree, in order to make up the $773,000,000, to be paid immediately to the needy veterans.

WE HAVE BEEN VERY LIBERAL WITH THE VETERANS

We have responded to every veteran demand. We passed the war risk insurance act, establishing an insurance system to take care of veteran casualties and disabilities. Whether or not a man took out insurance, compensation was given to him for death or disability. Widows and orphans receive monthly allowances, and veterans, where disabled, are given compensation calculated on the basis of loss of earning power. We have established vocational rehabilitation schools and spent in the process over $600,000,000. We have developed a system of hospitalization providing complete medical care and treatment. We passed the adjusted compensation act, under which more than 300,000 veterans are receiving compensation according to their disabilities. Last year we passed a bill providing as much as $40 for each service man for disabilities not incurred in line of duty. All this is in addition to the 50 per cent loan permitted on the bonus certificates. More recently the House passed, and there is pending in the Senate, a very liberal pension bill for the benefit of widows and orphans and dependents of veterans, which involves an expenditure of $20,000,000 a year when it shall have been passed by the Senate and signed by the President. One hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars was made available this year for special veterans' unemployment offices; more offices are to be opened next year, and when fully put into effect the plan will cost $450,000 per annum.

Some 20 States have provided for additional bonus payments to their veterans. Twenty-eight of the States have spent a total of over $39,000,000 for general and emergency veteran relief of one sort and another. Ten States have spent a total of $7,500,000 additional on educational agencies. Six States have loaned a total of $56,621,000 to veterans to help them establish themselves on farms or buy their own homes.

Many States provide for tax exemptions for veterans—exemptions from poll taxes, road taxes, and taxes on home sites. Superimposed on all these benefits is the veteran preference in civil-service examinations. Whereas every other applicant is required to make a grade of at least 70 per cent in examinations, an able-bodied veteran may pass at 65 per cent, and a disabled veteran need only make a grade of 60 per cent. Widows and wives of disabled veterans are given similar preference.

I herewith submit a statement of postwar expenditures for veterans:

Postwar expenditures

(Figures to nearest 1,000)

Disability compensation (payable to 322,825 ex-service men whose disabilities were incurred in or aggravated by service)[1]	$1,909,242,000
Disability allowance (payable to 353,744 ex-service men whose disabilities are not related to wartime service)[1]	70,248,000
War-risk insurance payments[1]	1,456,971,000
Vocational rehabilitation[1]	644,943,000
Emergency officers' retirement act[1]	34,750,000
Hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient facilities[2]	97,450,000
New hospital and domiciliary construction at soldiers' homes[2]	9,425,000
Permanent improvements and extensions to veterans' hospitals[2]	14,000,000
Operation and maintenance of Government hospital facilities[2]	435,000,000
Discharge fee	270,000,000
Expenditures of 30 States for veteran benefits	520,000,000
Loans on adjusted-service certificates[3]	1,260,000,000
Total	6,782,029,000
Deduct war-risk premiums	450,000,000
Net cost of peace to date	6,332,029,000

Indeed, one dollar out of every four spent by the Government goes for the aid and relief of veterans. In other words, 25 per cent of our governmental expenditures is for veteran relief.

I, therefore, can not vote for an additional outlay of $2,400,000,000. I am willing only to pay that which has been earned, namely, $773,000,000.

FIAT OR PRINTING PRESS MONEY MUST BE AVOIDED

The Patman bill sets up a scheme for printing-press money to the extent of $2,400,000,000. I say this emphatically, despite the statements made to the contrary by the previous speakers, that money that has nothing behind it but the faith and credit of the Government that prints it is printing-press or fiat money. It certainly is not what we know as "sound money," which is money made of a commodity or redeemable in a commodity which has a stable value in the markets of the world, like gold or silver. Fiat money is an order of the government or sovereign to consider a piece of paper as money. It is a command to use it as money.

The Patman bill sets up money which is not redeemable in gold or silver, is not backed up by commercial paper, is not backed up by Government bonds of definitely recognized value.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. In a moment. It is the simplest thing in the world for the Government to print money. The Government takes a little piece of paper, and, as with a magic wand, says, "Be thou a dollar," or "five," or "ten," or "a hundred dollars." But strangely enough, the people do not accept the command that that piece of paper should be dealt with as a dollar, or as five, or ten, or a hundred dollars. I am reminded of a story told by President Lincoln. He propounded the question, "If I call a lamb's tail a leg, how many legs has the lamb?" Some one answered, "Five legs." Lincoln replied, "No; because calling a tail a leg does not make it a leg." And, Mr. Chairman, calling a bonus dollar a dollar does not make it a dollar. It is only a piece of paper. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman says that fiat money is money not redeemable in metal.

Mr. CELLER. The money provided for by the Patman bill is fiat money. Not all money irredeemable in metal is fiat money. For example, our national bank notes are backed up by 2 per cent Panama Canal consols. That is not fiat money, although it is not redeemable in metal. It has, however, the full faith and credit of the United States behind it, as well as the resources of the national bank issuing it, in addition to the bonds of a project which is self-liquidating. That is not fiat money. But the Patman bill offers money with nothing behind it except the faith and credit of the Government. There is no redemption promise in the bill. It would be necessary for us to come here afterwards and pass another bill, as we did with the greenbacks during the Civil War, and make the money redeemable in something of tangible value.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CELLER. I refuse to yield. As soon as we would issue this $2,400,000,000 the so-called Gresham law would operate. That is, bad currency forces good money out of circulation. The bonus bills, having nothing behind them, would force all our good money out of circulation.

We have five kinds of currency, aside from coins—

First. Silver certificates, issued to the extent of $491,000,000, against which there is deposited an equivalent amount of silver dollars.

Second. Gold certificates, to the extent of $1,700,000,000, against which there is deposited in the Treasury the full equivalent in gold.

Third. Federal reserve notes, of which there was outstanding on July 1, 1931, $1,956,000,000, and against which there is a 40 per cent gold reserve and eligible commercial paper, as well as definite marketable Government bonds, under the recently passed Glass-Steagall Act.

Fourth. National bank notes, to the extent of $675,000,000, backed up by Panama Canal consols to an equivalent amount, together with resources of the national banks.

Fifth. United States notes (greenbacks), to the extent of $346,000,000, against which there is a basis of $150,000,000 in gold.

All these denominations may be called good, sound money. As soon as the bonus bills make their appearance all of the above currencies will be driven out of circulation. In fact, it is already difficult to get a gold certificate. Look into your pockets at the present moment—you may have some money, although most of us have not—do you find a gold certificate? Of course not. Gold certificates are as scarce as hen's teeth. In New York I have not laid my eyes on a gold certificate for months. The people are hoarding them.

The minute you pass this bill you will drive more gold certificates out of circulation. When you must choose between certificates or bills backed up by gold and certificates, or bills backed up by nothing, the selection is not difficult.

If this bill ever becomes a law, silver and gold certificates would disappear, as would also Federal reserve notes, national bank notes, and United States notes, or greenbacks. Already Gresham's law is operating and driving gold money out of circulation.

Our experience, and the experience of every nation with soft money or printing-press money, has been disastrous. It has been tried several times in the history of China with terrifying results. Likewise in Persia. In the thirteenth century a Persian monarch initiated a scheme of irredeemable paper money. Eventually there was great distress among the people, and the monarch was murdered in a popular uprising. The same idea was rediscovered by the great Scotch financier, Law, at the beginning of the eighteenth century. And he, too, had to flee for his life after the bubble collapsed. Then we had the French "assignats." The country at first was made immeasurably rich; there was great inflation; prices went sky high; and the value of the paper money went down. The printing press kept printing in endless streams the pieces of paper money called "assignats." There seemed to be no end. Speculation became a mania. Then the collapse came. The bubble burst.

Germany soon after the World War started her printing presses going. Trillions of marks were printed. There was no stable basis. What was the result? A wagonload of marks could not buy a wagon.

During our Revolutionary War the Continental Congress could not levy taxes. It therefore sought to finance the Revolutionary War by the printing of money, with nothing behind it. The more issues that were printed the greater became the depreciation in value. The people refused to accept the money on face value. There was great speculation in this money. At one time a thousand continental dollars brought only a dollar.

The various State assemblies inflicted upon the inhabitants severe punishments for their failure to consider continental money as full legal tender. Money penalties and imprisonment, and even loss of heirs, and the penalty of being outlawed as enemies of the country were inflicted. Yet the people would not accept the money. It was at that time that the phrase was coined, "It is not worth a continental." So the bonus dollar, in due course, would "not be worth a continental."

I AM OPPOSED TO DECEIVING THE SOLDIERS

The bonus dollars would steadily go down in value. I want the soldier paid in sound American dollars and not in fiat money. We had another sad experience during the Civil War. As a result of military necessity and due to lack of metal the Government, to finance the Civil War, printed millions of "greenbacks." There was nothing behind them. Soon after they were issued they depreciated in value. They became worth only 38 cents on the dollar. So it will be with the bonus dollar. They will dwindle down to 38 cents or lower.

These "greenbacks" during the Civil War were most distasteful to the inhabitants. Many refused to handle them. Gresham's law was again operating to drive out good money. There was even a lack of small coins, like nickels, pennies, and dimes. People hung on to the coins, hoarded them—so disastrous was the effect of the greenbacks. For purposes of trade and exchange the Government was compelled to issue fractional greenbacks, or postage-stamp money, "shinplasters," in denominations of 5, 10, 25 cents, and so forth. After a long struggle of many years, the greenbacks became redeemable in full. They became interchangeable with all other currencies. Faith was renewed in them. Of these "greenbacks" there was outstanding at the end of the last fiscal year $346,000,000; but there is behind them, as a result of additional legislation, $150,000,000 in gold.

This country will not tolerate a debased currency. Experience should teach us now to shun printing-press money in any form.

Furthermore, such money would involve a snare and a delusion to the veteran. He thinks he is getting good, old American dollars. Instead he gets soft, debased money. I shall not be a party to the deception.

Senator Carl Schurz in the Senate in 1874, speaking against currency inflation by fiat money as a remedy for the distress caused by the panic of 1873, said:

> When looking at the scheme advocated here to relieve distress and to revive prosperity one might almost believe that gentlemen with the most serious faces were carrying on a game of cruel mockery with those who look up to us for guidance and aid. If they ask for bread, * * * I entreat, do not give them a stone. If you do not know how to aid them, at least do not deceive them; do not impose upon their credulity by offering to them as a remedy for their ills * * * the extension of a money system which, wherever it has been tried, has always turned all social and economic movements into a game of chance and overreaching in which always those lose most who have least to lose.

These words are as cogent and compelling as when first uttered.

I could give paragraph after paragraph of speeches inculcating the same lesson—to shun a debased currency—from the works of Jefferson, Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, John Stuart Mill, and Adam Smith.

THE POOR WILL SUFFER

Wildcat speculation, gambling, and desire to get rich quick are some of the major causes of our present difficulties. The pendulum now swings the other way. Under such circumstances the poor and least able to bear burdens are hardest hit. But certainly fiat or soft money will not rescue the poor or those bent low with burdens, because history has taught us that irredeemable soft or fiat money always reacts most disastrously upon the poor. The rich man can take care of his interests; he can provide for his own welfare, despite the vicissitudes of fluctuation in the values of commodities and money. If the currency is inflated and the value of money declines while the value of commodities increases, the rich man can speculate upon such fall and upon such rise. He commands the situation and can take care not to be its victim; he anticipates these declines or increases because he is possessed of a knowledge of the factors causing these changes, which knowledge is denied the poorer man. The latter, living from hand to mouth, on his daily earnings, is the slave of his necessities; he is unaware of the forces working against him; he can not, like the rich man, speculate on the rise in commodities or the fall in money; he needs every penny he earns for his food, shelter, and clothing.

When the currency declines in value, who is the first and who is the hardest hit? The laboring man. His wages buy less, his purchasing power is reduced; he therefore earns less.

CONFIDENCE CAN NOT BE RESTORED

We are told that confidence is necessary to rescue the people from the depression. But fiat money frightens and intimidates. The merchant, for example, becomes worried at the fluctuations in the value of the currency and will only buy for his trade's immediate needs. His profits dwindle, and he is able to buy less with his money. While the commodities on his shelves may increase in value, this increase is more than offset by the higher price he pays for new goods. Investors become frightened; they invest in countries where there is no fiat money. Foreign investors particularly would withdraw their money from the United States; they would fear confiscation. They are creditors of the United States, and if fiat money is made legal tender for the dollar these foreign investors would fear that the obligations they hold would be paid with the debased currency and they would receive less than they feel they would be entitled to. Gold would leave the country in tremendous quantities. France, for example, has millions and millions of dollars in gold in the vaults of the Federal reserve banks. That money and other French credits would be withdrawn. Other countries would follow suit. It would be difficult for us to remain on the gold standard.

It is difficult to estimate all the havoc the passage of this bill and its enactment into law would create. Certainly no new jobs would be created. There would, on the other hand, be more idleness, and the veterans in the long run would be the losers.

WHY NOT PAY ALL THE PUBLIC DEBT WITH FIAT MONEY?

Why did we recently go through all the turmoil and the travail of passing a tax bill of $1,800,000,000? Why not authorize the Treasury to issue $1,800,000,000 in fiat money, and in that way pay the interest on the public debt and all Government expenses? I am sure that the Members of this House would set up an awful howl if they were paid their salaries with bogus or fiat money. It would be mighty easy for the Government to pay its obligations in this way. In fact, why raise any taxes at all? It is so much easier to print paper money and pay every debt that way. There is no good reason why we should limit ourselves to the payment of the bonus with fiat money, and if the printing presses will not hold out, we can turn pants buttons into pennies and if necessary make wooden dollars.

CONCLUSION

Since the Patman bill would be a snare and a delusion to the veterans, since it would be embarking upon the dangerous scheme of printing-press money, since it would make our economic confusion worse confounded and create more unemployment and distress, since it would drive good money out of circulation, and since it would be a discrimination in favor of the unemployed veteran as against the unemployed nonveteran, I shall vote against it.

I shall, however, vote for the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates as same shall have been earned to date.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, probably nothing could more depress me than to say no to the men with whom I marched and dug trenches and with whom I slept in tents, with whom I shared the trials of the field. This is especially difficult, concerning something they sincerely believe is due them, something to which they feel they are entitled; but I feel myself forced to give that answer on this question to-day. The question of issuing money has come before us, and the contention has been presented that we have some money in circulation which is defective. Is it suggested sincerely in this House that this justifies the issue of more defective money?

We have been passing through a terrible depression. We have undergone trials in this House to balance the Budget of the Nation. I want to give you a figure or two, to make clear how unbalanced that Budget was. The deficit of this year is twenty-five times as great as any deficit this Nation ever incurred in a previous peace-time year. It was four times as great as the entire deficit of the Civil War. It was twenty-five times as great as the deficit incurred in 1899, which was the big deficit year in connection with the Spanish-American War. It was more than ten times as great as the deficit incurred by Great Britain in 1923, which, as far as I find in the records, was the greatest deficit ever made by any government in peace times.

Now, we have passed a bill, which dips to the very bottom of the pockets of the people of this Nation. Many businesses will close their doors from its effect. Now we bring in a proposal that for 4 per cent of the people of the Nation we shall incur an additional debt of $1,633,000,000, when we have a debt of approximately $20,000,000,000. That is the additional obligation this payment at this time would entail. If we are going to pay it, for God's sake, pay it like men, with honest money, with a bond issue.

Make it a straightforward deal and not an effort to dodge the issue. There is no alchemy, there is no trick by which you can make something worth something that otherwise is basically valueless. The Government stamp does not make anything worth while unless it carries some goods or some value behind it. You can not make it of real value in any other way.

In other words, if we are to make this payment at this time, it has to come from somebody. It has to come from the people of this Nation, and the people of this Nation are in just as serious condition as are my comrades with whom I went to war and in whose case I am sincerely interested. It has to come from the men who are over 50 years of age. It has to come from those who have just come into their majorities, and those who have not yet become established in life. It has to come from all the people of this country. There is no other way by which it can be done. To pay this levy we must dip into the pockets of the other sufferers, the other unemployed. You can not justify it. [Applause.]

It has just been called to the attention of the committee that the war veterans of the United States are paid nearly as much as all the war veterans of Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Canada combined, despite the fact that we had in service 4,757,240 men compared with 34,000,000 for these nations. May I call to your attention also that the World War veterans and their families are benefactors to the extent of several hundreds of millions of dollars at the present time, which improves their average situation over that of the nonservice civilian. The World War veteran probably is at the most employable age of life. That gives him an advantage over the youthful who have not yet become established and the aged who have passed the zenith of earning ability.

We are in a great emergency, and every outlay of this Government should be for its necessary operation and the prevention of suffering. On these grounds we can not justify this expense at this time. To attempt to meet it by a monetary subterfuge is an effort to evade the real question by a method economic law will not sustain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it is obviously difficult, it is practically impossible, in five minutes, to say anything worth while upon a problem of such scope. It is humiliating, I am sure, to every thoughtful Member of this House that a measure which reaches so profoundly into fundamental economic principles should have to be discussed and perhaps run the risk of passage in this House after four brief hours of scattered debate. It is most unfortunate that it should be brought up on the crowded fag end of a session, when few can give it proper attention, and on the eve of a political campaign, when many Members of the House—and I say it advisedly, because I have talked with many of our colleagues—may feel constrained to vote for the measure, not because of their convictions as to its worth but because of what they fear for their own political future. It is a catastrophe that a proposal of this kind should be brought before the House at a moment when the industrial and economic life of our country are paralyzed by fear and dread and when the little spark of confidence that remains is apt to be extinguished by the dangers involved in the passage of such a bill.

I am sure there is no Member of this House, man or woman, who has not been deeply moved by the sight of these veterans of the World War who have been with us for the past two weeks. They have handled themselves well. They have not disturbed the peace. They have successfully resisted the temptations of un-American agitators. They have commanded our sympathy and respect, because they have shown the qualities of good soldiers and good Americans. There is an added pathos about it all in the fact that these men, and many of their comrades at home, have been woefully misguided by certain Members of this House, misguided in being taught to believe that the Federal Government owes them something and is withholding something from them which is their due; misguided in believing that the Federal Government should extend to them special favors at a time when vast numbers of other Americans are in equal distress; misguided furthermore in being led to think that this measure will bring benefits to the country which they served in the war, and will benefit their own interests.

I say they have been misguided as to what the Government owes them. They have been told and they honestly believe that the Government owes them something which it has not given them. They have not been told often enough what the Government has done for them. As has been said on the floor this morning, during the present fiscal year our Government is expending for the special benefit of the veterans of the World War alone no less than $860,000,000. That is one-third of all the taxes that are being collected from our people for all purposes. It means an average of nearly $200 for each and every one of the 4,000,000 and more veterans who served for a greater or shorter length of time during the World War. And this takes no account of the loans being extended to these veterans upon their certificates.

As for the bonus, I was one of the early advocates of it on this floor. I voted for it over the vetoes of two Presidents of my own party—in 1922 and 1924. I believed that it was an obligation which was fully justified. I still do, and I would gladly vote to-day for the payment of the original sum which the veterans asked for plus accumulated interest from the time they left the service up to the present time or up to the date of payment. I can not, however, see any obligation on the part of the Government to pay also to-day interest for the next 13 years which is not yet due but which is involved in the demand for payment of the "face value."

There is no time left me to discuss the special provisions of this bill, or their economic ramifications, but I am convinced that if it should be enacted into law, this country within 24 hours would pass off the gold standard, and the easy way of raising money by merely printing it, to which this bill points the way, would be resorted to again and again as it was in Germany and as it was in France within the past decade. This would do incalculable harm to every wage earner in the country and to every man who has a salary. It would do incalculable harm to everyone who has insurance, or who has deposits in savings banks. It would do incalculable harm to the veterans themselves, because whatever they have won in the way of promises from the Government for compensation, for disability allowances, or for retirement allowances would be diminished in value and might be completely wiped out. I discussed these possibilities at considerable length before the Ways and Means Committee and can not in the brief time available to-day attempt to repeat what I then said. (See hearings, pp. 459–469; also CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 9143–9146.)

Mr. Chairman, our country has shown, as it should, generous evidence of its gratitude for the inestimable service which these men rendered in the war, and it will continue to do so. But it can not afford to do that which it is asked to do in this bill, because it would be to the detriment or peril of all our people. The ex-service men, if informed of the truth, would not want us to do so. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to my friends on this side of the aisle, men who served in the war, officers who cleverly have been called to oppose this bill, and I have wondered if men who oppose, receiving what they do in compensation from the Federal Government to-day, and some who served during the war receiving officers' pay can fully understand or comprehend the position of the man we sent to France to fight at a dollar a day. I did not serve in the war. I was here in Congress when they were sent over, but when I enlisted at Fort Myer as a youth I received $13 a month and know the difference between $13 a month or $1 a day paid our soldiers in France compared with the man who gets possibly $30 or more a day, depending on his outside income. Fair and honest judgment you must exercise, and I ask that in all sincerity.

I helped prepare the first adjusted compensation bill, and it was carried over a President's veto, returned under advice of the Treasury Department. The bill loaning 50 per cent of the adjusted-service certificates last year was again opposed by the Treasury, and again Congress overruled the President's veto, always urged by the Treasury. Surely, gentlemen are not demagogues or hypocrites, who stand here and plead for these poor fellows throughout the country out of employment. We are just as honest as men who do not comprehend the position these veterans are in who ask for jobs or for the bonus.

I grant we have done more for our soldiers than any other country, as has been stated, but the wealthiest Government in the world has always done that. The chart just presented stated we have paid something over $800,000,000 a year for pensions, and it is right that we should aid the disabled soldier. There is not a man, I submit, who would rise in his place and oppose it. Not one man among us envies the man who fought in the trenches and was disabled. It is said, my friends, that we should not vote for this bill because, forsooth, it will only give relief to a few men. Those of you who are on the Democratic side of the aisle the other day were ready to give away an equal amount of money, or practically so, under a caucas rule, for what? Public buildings, river, flood control, and things like that, which would employ possibly 200,000 or 300,000 men. The money provided under this bill is going to 4,000,000 men and to their families, men whom you have promised to pay. Their needs are greater to-day than ever before, their families in many cases are in want, and they ask for relief through the dollar a day promised them in addition to the $1 a day paid them during the war. That is a Government pledge Congress has enacted into law. It ought to have been paid long ago. They should not wait 13 years more to get this slight relief. No one should question their present needs or their rights over the average unemployed because evidenced by certificates that contain a Government's promise to pay for war sacrifices.

NO FIAT MONEY IS PROPOSED

It has been charged that to do so Congress must set all the printing presses going to pay fiat money and bankrupt the Government. No one believes this is said seriously, but it is a frivolous argument which may excuse those who need an excuse for their votes. I do not care how you pay them; I do not care if you pay them by bonds, to mature in 1945 or beyond that time. Many plans are offered, and a bond payment should not frighten the average Member. When the war was on I was in the House, and Congress sent these men to fight without any volition on their part. A little company I organized in my home city before the war lost 88 men killed or died in France. Over 13,000 men were disabled or suffered casualties in the Thirty-second Division, composed of Wisconsin and Michigan troops. That is war. We borrowed twenty to thirty billions of dollars to wage that war, did we not? Yes; and we were not balancing the Budget then, and we never balanced the Budget nor were called upon to do so until this year. Permanent improvements and enormous expenditures have been undertaken without Executive protest, but heavy demands for taxation and slashing of wages are now asked to balance the Budget. I repeat we borrowed around $30,000,000,000 to wage war in Europe, and now men here predict bankruptcy if these certificates are to be cashed by a comparatively small bond issue, small compared with $30,000,000,000 or $11,000,000,000 we loaned Europe and have discounted to one-half that amount. We could do that for Europe. How about the veterans that saved Europe and are now forgotten while Europe demands from us complete cancellation of their debts?

BONUS SHOULD HAVE BEEN PAID LONG AGO

I did not expect to inject myself into this discussion. I helped draw the adjusted compensation bill, urged its cash payment then, and have actively supported it since. One speaker said payment of the bonus would only help a few of the unemployed. The public building and river bill that passed the House last week would only employ around 200,000, when the bonus payment would reach 4,000,000. Other speakers said inflation to pay the bonus bill would start the printing presses as in Germany. No one believes that. Those who voted for the Garner bill imperiled their country if so.

But we are told a handful of wet, bedraggled veterans over at Anacostia, begging for the bonus, are threatening Congress. That is not true, but only an excuse for refusing them some compensation. One million veterans back home out of employment and their families are waiting for aid. We sent these men to fight, took them from their jobs, and gave them a dollar a day. The bonus was only another dollar a day, while their friends at home received ten times a soldier's pay.

Veterans are asking for the payment of that promise. Never in all history was the need of these men greater. The wealthiest country in the world, that borrowed from twenty to thirty billion dollars to run the war, that never balanced its Budget then, is now advised by those who have always opposed this bonus that a payment now will bankrupt the Government. Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues not to indulge in hypocritical reasoning. Those who here enjoy $30 a day or more should not denounce these wet, ragged, bedraggled men soaked for days in the rain, who only ask for a dollar a day. They ask for bread for themselves and families. They ask it from the wealthiest country in the world, for which they fought. Among those who came back, a million or more are in dire need. They ask for bread, and Congress should not offer them a stone.

Thousands of these veterans are here. I concede some one is to blame. They are rain soaked, poorly dressed, hungry, and without jobs. Not one has asked me to vote for this bill. Many have come here, misguided, but hopeful of getting relief. They are here because they are out of employment and do not know where else to turn for relief. They are men who served your country and mine. Not one of them has a job. Their families dependent on them are back home. Four million veterans in round numbers with their families are entitled to relief. Possibly a dozen or more millions in all, counting families. Many of them are in need because without employment. We can not give them jobs. We all know that. Then, let us do the best we can and give them what Congress has promised would be given, this bonus. Let us cancel the debt. [Applause.]

GIVE THEM THEIR DUE

It is argued that the veteran's certificate is not due until 1945 and should be computed at its present cash value.

The Government has profited by 2 per cent interest annually from all those who borrowed on their certificates since loans were made, and this "bonus" will not pay the real debt owed by our people to veterans if doubled and redoubled in amount. Again it is said that only needy veterans should be paid when the Government is sorely pressed for many relief measures. That would be difficult if not impossible to determine when the present emergency requires immediate relief of distress and want by hundreds of thousands, of veterans and their families.

It is also argued that alleged "veterans" drafted into safety positions two or three months before the close of the war should not be classed with real veterans. As one who served in the Regular Army five years and double that time in my State's National Guard, I appreciate a distinction in service between "veterans," but it is better to err in giving limited bonus aid in all cases than to neglect the needy.

I was active, as stated, when the original adjusted compensation bill was before our committee, and favored immediate cash payment. We accepted a compromise, but many reasons were offered for cash payment then. One all-sufficient reason was that Congress drafted an army of 4,000,000 men to fight in Europe and they had no voice in that decision. The enlisted men then were given around a dollar a day for war service, as stated, with deductions from their small pay for insurance and dependents, while many of their civilian comrades remaining in safe places at home were paid from five to ten times or more the pittance given those we sent to France to fight.

If it was their duty to fight for those who stayed home, it is our duty to make some effort at just compensation now.

Last year, General Hines said to our committee, 300,000 veterans were then asking for jobs. Over the President's veto Congress granted an additional loaning privilege then and saved much suffering. To-day many hundreds of thousands of veterans are needy, out of jobs which Congress first took from them when they were drafted for war. Those who now would treat the jobless veterans as needless burdens are among those who cheered them on their way to France.

IF PATRIOTS THEN, THEY ARE PATRIOTS NOW

I remember how they marched through the Capital City 15 years ago, singing patriotic songs under the lead of song and cheer leaders. Well dressed, well fed, they were a fine military body of men. Brought here now, misguided by advisers, thousands of these veterans are again around the Capital, splendidly behaved, fine boys; but, poorly dressed, hungry, and without jobs. They do not ask for alms, but they sincerely believe a grateful Government should give them and the millions of veterans back home their promised "bonus" for themselves and needy dependents.

Tenfold their service pay would not compensate the average man who fought in the trenches where those 13,000 Wisconsin and Michigan troops of the Thirty-second Division suffered casualties, during which time the French termed them "Les terribles." Those not disabled in war have lost their jobs, and that is next to war. We were proud of these boys then, why not now?

The world is still topsy-turvy. Business is depressed, but this country has more natural resources and wealth than in 1917, and more than any other world power possesses. It is certain to swing back the pendulum to better times.

This session, Congress has furnished $2,000,000,000, if need be, to save railways, banks, and other businesses from bankruptcy, and I voted for the reconstruction bill as a necessary relief measure to save widespread disaster and inspire business confidence. We have voted many other needed relief measures this session and will vote more.

To win the war, as I have stated, we borrowed between twenty and thirty billion dollars. It will not bankrupt the Government to borrow sufficient money to pay the bonus to these men who won the war. Other means of payment are in the bill, but, whether inflation to stop deflation or a bond issue is needed, the bonus should be paid.

Not one man in ten who stayed home in 1917 with a good job would have exchanged places and hazards with their doughboy comrades at $5 a day or double that figure.

PAYMENT NOW WILL HELP PAY DEBTS OF VETERANS AND AID MILLIONS OF OTHERS

Payment of the bonus will help pay debts in every community and put in circulation money in every county, in every State in the country, not restricted to aid of veterans alone, for it will give general relief. It will also pay a Government obligation, and if these men were patriotic enough to fight in foreign trenches and battlefields in a war to end wars, as Congress required them to do, then the wealthiest Government in the world should be patriotic enough to pay them after the task is performed and when they are in need, and no sane man will question that need now.

I have opposed wasting public money by erecting extravagant post offices at every country crossroads or by digging deeper channels for commerceless rivers and creeks or flood-control profiteering, 80 per cent of which sometimes is extravagance and waste, but I can think of no more worthy and needed relief measure involving practically the same proposed expenditure than that which cares for veterans we drafted to fight our battles and who hold from us their Government's promise to pay.

The public will some day again shout for war and again forget those who make the sacrifice. That is human nature, but we should "balance the budget" debt to those who paid the price with hard-earned war service before another war comes. Other needed relief measures are urgent this session, and some have been passed, but I see none more pressing than this effort to cancel the bonus debt and save America's war veterans and their families from want and suffering.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat disappointed in the contention that has been made here this morning and persisted in that this bill will be a charge on the Treasury of the United States.

The assertion is made that you can not issue money that is worth nothing without being a charge upon somebody. From the foundation of this Government our currency has been based on three things, and if the currency is increased it is always by one of three methods. You either buy silver, you buy gold, or you buy Government securities, and either one is something of intrinsic value. If Government bonds are not worth anything, then the credit of the United States is not worth anything.

I take the position that we have come to the point in our national existence when we must have an expansion of currency. I believe that for this reason: That the dollar is now worth from $1.50 to $1.60, compared with what it was worth in normal times. We know the need of expansion for another reason. My people who made debts on 20-cent cotton can not pay those debts on 4-cent cotton; that my people who made debts on $1.50 corn can not pay those debts on 25-cent corn. I insist the time has come when the currency must be expanded. I do not mean inflated, but where it must be put on a parity with the commodities we have to sell in order to get money.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Let me suggest that the dollar should be deflated.

Mr. BROWNING. Well, I think possibly that would be more in keeping with what we are trying to do. Here is our position: We must either expand the currency by the purchase of gold, by the purchase of silver, or by the purchase of Government securities.

These adjusted-service certificates are just as much an obligation on the part of this Government as any bond it ever issued and on which the Government's name was signed. I challenge those gentlemen who have said this is fiat money to get up here and say they are willing to repudiate the bonds—the adjusted-service certificates—the Government has issued. They are national obligations. If we are looking for a Government obligation to exchange for a circulating medium, what kind are we going to look for? Are you going to the banks that now have all the money hoarded and pay them money to put in their vaults for the bonds they hold, or are you going to pick out those securities that are scattered throughout the Nation, in the hands of people in every section of the country, and buy those? In other words, use those as an exchange for a circulating medium. I insist it is absolutely sound that we purchase those that are scattered all over the country and in the hands of those we know will not hoard the money, so that money will get into circulation and in some measure equalize the value of the dollar in comparison with commodities.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Thereby transforming a non-negotiable security into a negotiable security?

Mr. BROWNING. That is all it does. I want to say to those who claim this is a charge against the Treasury that not only is it not a charge against the Treasury but it will mean a saving to the Budget of this country of $112,000,000 a year from now until 1945, because that is what the sinking fund is required to provide to meet these adjusted-service certificates when they become due.

Now, somebody says we are to issue bonds under this. That is true; and the only possible charge this could be against the people is 3½ per cent interest which these bonds will bear if and when they are sold. I hope they will be sold next year, because the dollar must get back to normal before they are sold. I know the people of this country would be glad if we could go back to the 1926 level and pay 3½ per cent interest on $2,000,000,000 in order to get the prices for commodities which we received then, and that is what this bill tends to do.

We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act under which we extended credit to the banks; but it did not do any good except to save the life of a few banks that borrowed this money and paid it to those who hoarded money again. The President knows, and those in high official positions know, that hoarding is still going on, and this is the only effective effort we have made to place money in circulation that can not be hoarded.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. COX. If the pending bill carried a provision providing for the payment of these certificates by the issuance and sale of bonds would the gentleman favor it?

Mr. BROWNING. No. I am not in favor of that. I will say frankly to the gentleman that my position is that I am in favor of the payment of these adjusted-service certificates in advance of the time they mature because I believe that will help expand the currency so that people can trade and buy and sell the things they produce at fair prices. [Applause.]

You talk about balancing the Budget. The Budget has not been balanced and everybody knows it has not been balanced. I do not think it will ever be balanced at the rate we are going, even if you raised the taxes sky high, for the people can not pay them. That is the reason I voted against the tax bill. However, if you will pass this measure you will take $112,000,000 off the Budget and expand the currency so that people can pay taxes, and unless you do that you can not balance the Budget.

Mr. COX. If the general welfare is that which the gentleman is undertaking to serve, why would it not be better served if you would issue this currency and pay all Government expenses, thereby reducing the tax burdens on the people.

Mr. BROWNING. I am not advocating promiscuous issuance of fiat money with no basis. I am as sound as the gentleman from Georgia. I advocate the exchange of Government securities for circulating medium, with an absolute check on inflation. You will reduce the tax burdens by passing this measure, and that is what I have been talking about. I just told the gentleman that if you buy bonds belonging to these banks you only buy bonds from those who already have money hoarded. So what is the use of giving them additional currency if they are going to hoard it? However, if you will pass this measure the money that will go out as the result of it will not be hoarded by big banks, and it will be turned over 10 times in payment of debts. I believe that is the only way you can balance the Budget. My serious judgment is that we must make it possible for somebody to pay taxes.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Other countries have expanded their currency, and is it not a fact that commodity prices have not increased in those countries that have tried this experiment?

Mr. BROWNING. In all of them except one, and the gentleman can read in the hearings where the economists cited that one case.

Mr. COLTON. I did not understand the gentleman. It has not increased commodity prices?

Mr. BROWNING. It has increased them in all of these countries except one.

Mr. COLTON. I had understood it had not, except temporarily.

Mr. BROWNING. It has increased them.

The standard of value in the world to-day is the American dollar. It is not the gold dollar of 25.8 grains nine-tenths fine, it is the American dollar such as you handle in your pocket, if you happen to be lucky enough to have one. This is the trade standard of the world to-day, and you know that if you increase the number of them, this automatically increases the price of commodities because it cheapens the dollar, and those who stand here in the name of courage and say they are opposed to this measure because they want to be statesmen are willing to line up with those people who have precipitated this condition, and are willing to help them to carry it out to the fullest extent. [Applause.]

I am telling you, frankly, this condition we are in is not just a mysterious, recurrent cycle of some kind. It is a man-made condition. There is no natural or divine law on which you can call as the cause of this depression. Those interests who have the money of the country to-day hoarded are primarily responsible for the condition from which we are suffering, and that is the condition I want to help to remedy if I can. Naturally, the ones who now hold the money do not want it cheapened. I want to run every dollar of it out of hiding with this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have listened with much interest to the gentleman's statement, particularly that part that said this measure would not increase the tax burden or the obligation of the Treasury——

Mr. BROWNING. Make it brief, please.

Mr. SIMMONS. How does the gentleman explain the fact that it would increase the load by paying a 1945 debt now and paying 13 years of unaccrued interest?

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman insist we would not have to meet the face value of these obligations in 1945?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is absolutely agreed.

Mr. BROWNING. Do you insist we would have to pay any interest on this currency that would be in circulation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know anything about that. The gentleman was talking about the issuance of bonds.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I am certain that no bill during this session has been more painstakingly considered than this. There is not a Member of this House who has not been touched by the plight of the ex-service men who are out of work. Many of them are here. I have been down to their camps and talked with them. They are here because they do not know where else to turn. They tell me, "Give us a job and we will not ask for the bonus."

Their splendid discipline has won our admiration. Ragged as many of them are we can not forget that any one of them might be resting where the unknown soldier sleeps. They had as good a right to come to present their case to us as the international bankers. We would help them in any way we could which would not injure the country they have served so well.

Weeks before they came, on April 25, I spoke in their behalf before the Ways and Means Committee. I presented a plan which seemed to me to be sound, which would not have placed an additional burden on the Treasury and the taxpayers of the country. My suggestion was as follows:

> At the option of the veteran let him turn in his adjusted-service certificate, less any amount due on loans previously made, ascertain its "present value" at a low rate of interest, say 2 or 3 per cent.
> For such present value deliver to the veteran $50 (or possibly $25) coupon bonds, all due in 1945, bearing 2 or 3 per cent interest.
>
> It substitutes one obligation of the Government for another—bonds for adjusted-service certificates, both due in 1945, and both to the same creditor, the veteran. It does not increase the total obligation. If the credit of the Government is not impaired by the fact that adjusted-service certificates due in 1945 are outstanding, the substitution of baby bonds for a like amount, and a like maturity, would not seem capable of impairing confidence in the Government.
> It would relieve distress and bring hope in hundreds of thousands of homes. Creditors of the veteran—his grocer, his coal man, his merchant, his mortgage holder, his doctor—would accept the bonds as money, and, I think, in most cases without discount, both because it pays a debt which he is glad to receive and for patriotic reasons also. It would bring Government credit to the grass roots, to every township in America. Because these small bonds would pass from hand to hand, they would tend to produce a moderate degree of inflation or "reflation," which we all agree is imperative if commodity values are to be turned upward—without which buying, production, and employment will continue from hand to mouth. At the same time such inflation would not tend to get out of hand.

I suggested also, in order to prevent these bonds from going below par, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to use the sinking fund—already set up for the retirement of the certificates in 1945—in purchasing them at par in the open market.

This plan would not have increased the burden on the Government; it would not have been an inducement to those not in actual need to surrender their certificates; and yet, by giving the holders the present value of the obligation which has run seven years, it would have made available several hundred million dollars of negotiable obligations of the Government for the relief of distress. For the present value of the nonnegotiable obligation—the certificate maturing in 1945—it would have placed in the hands of needy men negotiable obligations maturing at the same time.

The other day the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], who has a distinguished record as major in the One hundred and thirteenth Field Artillery of the American Expeditionary Forces, introduced a bill which carries out the ideas I expressed before the Ways and Means Committee. I should be glad to support it. But the lines have been tightly drawn. A fair and reasonable adjustment will not be agreed to. It is "all or nothing"—and this despite the fact that the Patman plan has never had a Chinaman's chance of passage. It has been known for days that 55 or more Senators would never agree to it, that the President would veto it if it did pass, and that it could not become law over his veto.

There are those who offer the ex-service men something impossible to deliver and there are those who would agree on a fair adjustment which would give them all that their certificates are now worth, with a reasonable chance that it would become law. As between the two, I must let the veterans judge where their real friends are.

The Patman plan calls for paying now the full 1945 value to every certificate holder. Mr. Speaker, there are 550,000 living veterans of the World War who for one reason or another do not hold adjusted-service certificates. The proportion of unemployed among them is probably as great as among those who hold certificates. If this is a relief measure, it is evident that this bill can not help them.

In addition, there are 826,000 certificate holders who, because they are not in need, are employed, or have independent means of their own, have not borrowed on their certificates. The average 1945 value of their certificates is $1,000 each. This bill would therefore pay out at this time $826,000,000 to men who have not asked for it, who do not need it. Can you defend that payment before the farmers, the idle wage earners, the business men, and the taxpayers of the Nation in these days of distress and destitution everywhere? What would be their reaction to that? Why, gentlemen, we have just laid a billion-dollar tax bill on every gallon of gasoline, on every bank check, on every letter that goes in the mail—a terrific burden on every man and woman in America—and yet you propose to pay out almost an equal sum to the service men who do not need it, who have not asked for it. Is it possible that you can build good will among the American people for the legitimate purposes of veterans' organizations by any such proposition as that?

Contrast that vast sum with what we propose for the relief of destitution everywhere in this land. In the Garner bill $100,000,000 is to be placed in the hands of the President to prevent actual starvation. In the Wagner bill, which is supposed to have the approval of the President, $300,000,000 is to be made available to loan to States and municipalities to relieve distress. And yet the Patman bill proposes to pay to men who do not need it eight times as much in one instance, and nearly three times as much in the other, as we propose to set aside for the poor and needy among 120,000,000 people. I do not think you can defend that proposition back home before 8,000,000 idle wage earners, before millions of farmers whose toil does not earn their taxes, before merchants and manufacturers and railroad men staggering under a load of new taxes. To pay at this time a debt of $2,400,000,000 which does not fall due until 1945 would mean the immediate disbursement of about $1,300,000,000 of unaccrued interest.

I am certain that the service men of our country would not have Uncle Sam go out and visit one home where there is a widowed mother whose husband was not in the Army, where there are undernourished children, and refuse relief to them, and then go to a neighboring home where the man may have worn the uniform but who is in good health and in favorable circumstances, and give $1,000 to him and deny it to that widow and those children.

If the ex-service men alone were out of work, it would be a different story. But, unfortunately, there are millions of others who are out of work, and I can not convince myself that the payment of $2,400,000,000 to less than 4 per cent of the population of this country will not make it more difficult, if not impossible, to take care of the millions of non-service men and their families if this terrible depression continues. Relief on account of disabilities incurred in service is one thing. But relief on account of unemployment places every American on an equal footing. I can not see it any other way. If this depression keeps up, the Federal Treasury will be the last hope of a distressed people. Upon it we must depend if all else fails. If the Nation's credit is further contracted, as there is real danger that this proposal would do, the depression might easily become much worse.

Before we adjourn it seems certain that some plan will be agreed upon to get the idle wheels of industry off dead center. I do not know what that plan will be, nor do I know whether I will approve of all of it. But whatever it is, it will represent the collective judgment of Congress in trying to meet a great emergency that affects every class and section of the country. It will cost money, either spent directly or loaned by the Federal Treasury. If the bonus bill is passed in advance of that, it will, I fear, make the latter impossible of enactment.

A widespread misunderstanding seems to exist with reference to the adjusted certificates. Under the law of 1924 the credit was based on number of days in service, to which was added 25 per cent. In the average case this came to $500. This was treated as a single payment on a 20-year endowment life-insurance policy. In 20 years, at 4 per cent compounded, this bought a $1,000 policy, payable in full to the veteran at that time, or, if he died at any time, in full to his widow. Meantime the Government had 20 years in which to accumulate a fund to meet these certificates or insurance policies in 1945. If in 1925, at a time when the country as a whole was prosperous, it was decided not to pay the $500 in cash, how can we argue that in 1932 we should pay the full $1,000 when the National Treasury has a deficit of $3,000,000,000; when the wages of hundreds of thousands of Government employees, National, State, and municipal, are being slashed to balance the Budget of the Nation, the States, and municipalities of the entire country, and when the most onerous peace-time tax bill in history has been imposed upon a suffering people in order to preserve the credit of this Government?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has gone from one proposition to another. H. R. 1 called for raising the two and one-half billion by a bond issue. This is the proposition that the American Legion at its Detroit convention voted not to ask of the country at this time. He has abandoned that and now proposes to raise the money neither by taxation nor by borrowing, but by issuing Treasury notes. By so doing, he has bid for the support of those who would benefit by cheapening the dollar.

I am utterly opposed to tying up veterans' legislation with financial reform or monetary experimentation. I say this despite the fact that I myself believe that the dollar has become entirely too high and prices too low. It was for this reason that I supported the Goldsborough bill. But I do not think the two propositions should be tied together. I will tell you why. This bill will either cause inflation or further deflation. No one knows. The economists disagree. Disregard, if you wish, the economists employed by the big banks, by the Federal reserve. The fact remains that the leading advocates of the stabilization of the price level state that this is the worst way to go about it. Irving Fisher, for example says, "I am unalterably opposed to the Patman bill in principle." I do not know of any economist of national standing who favors it as a means of restoring the price level. But whether the soldiers' bonus bill will be a cure-all or bring ruin, I do not know. None of us know. I do not think the experts know. They are guessing on probabilities. The results are wholly unpredictable. They are dealing in futures.

If the bill brought benefit to the Nation, well and good. But suppose it did not. Suppose, as many say, it would, in these nervous times, cause a run on gold, a flight from the paper dollar, the hoarding of gold, both at home and abroad, the further contraction of credit, the closing of more banks, what then? Gentlemen, I say to you, as the friends of the ex-service men, that if this should be the unfortunate result, you would give the veterans of the World War a black eye before the American public which they would not recover from for a generation, if ever.

I do not want to subject the long term and legitimate policies of veterans' organizations—the care for the disabled, the widows and orphans—to that hazard. Those who are willing to put them to that risk have more confidence in the infallibility of their powers of prophecy than I.

That is the way it looks to me. I may be wrong. But looking at it as I do I will not do anything that I conscientiously believe might permanently injure the true ends and long-view objectives of the veterans of this Nation.

It is by no means certain that the issuance of this money would start values upward. The great bulk of the money work of the country—90 per cent of it—is done by bank checks—by "deposit currency." The relationship between checks and cash is like that between dollars and dimes. If—and I do not say that would be the result, because I do not know—but if the issuance of two and one-half billions of currency caused the further shrinkage of bank deposits from hoarding by an equal or even less amount, the whole thing would be neutralized or made much worse.

If, on the other hand, it did cause a rapid inflation, you have other soldiers and their dependents to think of. I refer to the 1,400,000 persons—pensioners of all wars, from the War of 1812 down, soldiers' widows, the disabled veterans, the orphaned children drawing the benefits of war-risk insurance. If the dollar fell rapidly and prices rose, the monthly checks of nearly a million and a half veterans and their dependents would buy less food, less coal, less medical care, fewer clothes than those checks are buying now. In other words, if this bill does what its advocates claim for it, you will take purchasing power from the aged veteran, the widows, and the soldiers' orphans in order to give purchasing power to the able-bodied. It seems to me that this is an additional reason for not tying together monetary reform with veterans' legislation. It is inevitable that such a result would not be helpful in the good relations that should exist among all beneficiaries of veterans' legislation.

It is true that the Owen amendment provides that for the $2,400,000,000 currency issue an equal amount of 20-year 3½ per cent bonds are to be deposited with the Federal Reserve Board to be sold if prices rise beyond the 1926 level. It is evident, however, that if these bonds are sold and remain outstanding only to 1945—13 years—you then have added an interest charge of 13 years times 3½ per cent, or 45.5 per cent, or $1,092,000,000. This added to the $2,400,000,000 would make a total cost to the taxpayer of $3,492,000,000 in 1945.

If the bonds are not retired for 20 years the interest charge alone would be 70 per cent, or $1,680,000,000, or a total of $4,080,000,000. That gives some idea of the possible cost to the Government and its taxpayers from the passage of this bill according to its own terms and conditions. And yet the gentlemen say that the issuance of $2,400,000,000 of paper currency will cost us nothing except the expense of printing it.

I know how so many feel about saving Europe, about pouring in credit at the top, about the financial racketeers who proceeded with their stock split-ups, their market rigging, their blue-sky salesmanship to our inland banks and investors of worthless European and South American securities which went on unchecked and even encouraged in high places for a decade until it burst in ruin all over this country. It is the most shameless chapter of exploitation the world has ever known. It does not have my approval. I did not vote for the moratorium. I said at the time: "Who is going to balance our Budget?" The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has done some good. No one with a billion or two to spend could help doing some good with it. But it has not put men to work. I felt at the time that the same sum could have been spent to better advantage—in financing necessary work, public or private, that would immediately provide jobs or in advancing funds to the thousands of closed banks and building and loan associations so that men could have their own money to use and to spend. But that is over the dam. That much of our credit is gone. We are still in the woods and have not yet put a "chicken in every pot" or "two cars in every garage."

And so, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that I feel that the payment at this time and in the manner proposed by this bill of $2,400,000,000, the great bulk of which will not be due until 1945, would further deplete our resources of credit and confidence, would further arouse our almost frantic taxpayers against any other measures, public or private, to finance jobs for the unemployed millions of this Nation—veterans and nonveterans—I am constrained to vote against this bill.

Lincoln, in his second inaugural, said that we should "bind up the Nation's wounds, and care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan." This is my creed. Beyond that I hold that we must treat every American alike.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall try in the brief time allotted me to discuss the three propositions which are set forth as justification for this bill. One, that it is a debt; second, destitution; and third, inflation.

If I should undertake to answer why it is not a debt, and should not be paid now, it would be utterly impossible for me to do it better than by using the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], who spoke a moment ago, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, page 2969. I quote in part from Mr. BROWNING'S speech:

> In view of these accomplishments I think Congress can justly say that in a large measure it has kept faith with the ex-service men of America. * * * A crisis was the reason for the creation of the class known as ex-service men. In that former crisis we gave instead of demanding. To cripple our Government when sorely pressed would be entirely out of keeping with the wonderful spirit that inspired our action in 1917–18, and I am afraid would tend to destroy some of the splendid reverence heretofore held for our service.

These were the words of Mr. BROWNING on January 29. Compare them with the words he uttered a moment ago.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No; I can not yield.

In 1925 Congress tried to meet this situation and agreed upon an average adjusted compensation of $498 per veteran, which forms the basis of an average adjusted-compensation certificate of $1,000. The reason the face of the average certificate is for $1,000 instead of $498 is on account of the accrued interest between 1925 and 1945, on the base amount of $498 in 1925 for the average veteran.

The accrued interest from now until 1945 is not due and is not a debt in any sense of the word. The payment of the bonus debt at this time involves a billion dollars of interest that has not accrued, and the only apparent justification for advance payment of it is that Congress is willing to pay out a billion dollars of the people's money, which is not due, in order to hold a block of votes for the coming election.

Now, as to the question of destitution. Mr. PATMAN said here yesterday that there are a million veterans out of employment. Well, there are 9,000,000 citizens out of employment. Are you going to pay out well over $2,000,000,000 in order to benefit 1,000,000 veterans in distress and leave 8,000,000 other citizens in just as great distress?

On the basis of Mr. PATMAN'S statement of 1,000,000 out of 4,000,000 veterans in distress, are you going to pay three men who are not in need because one is in need? Are you going to use one poor distressed veteran as a smoke screen for the excuse of paying three of us who do not need it?

There are some 60 or 70 of us veterans who are Members of this House. Should the Government pay us 13 years of unaccrued interest on our adjusted-service certificates, which interest is not due, and permit destitution to be the excuse? In my own case I hold a certificate for $1,580. On the basis of $1 a day for home service and $1.25 a day for foreign service, something like $680 was due me. The accrued interest on that amount by 1945 makes my certificate worth $1,580. My certificate of principal and accrued interest to date is not, under any reasonable process of figuring, worth over $850 to $900. I can not under any process of reasoning bring myself to believe that I am now entitled to this $600 of unearned interest. Least of all can I do it in the name of millions of distressed unemployed people in this country.

What I have said here of myself is equally applicable to every other veteran who is employed. Again I call your attention to the fact that, according to the statement of Mr. PATMAN, the father of this bill, there are only 1,000,000 veterans unemployed, which leaves more than 3,000,000 veterans who are employed and therefore not in distress.

If this is to remain a Christian Nation, of course the 1,000,000 veterans must be given an opportunity to live. In my judgment we are not going to spend millions but hundreds of millions of dollars during the next 10 or 15 months to alleviate human distress and suffering. Such a program must not be confined alone to the veterans. Destitution is not alone confined to veterans, and therefore relief for destitution must not be confined to veterans, especially when such a relief program includes paying interest not yet due to three veterans who are not in distress to every one who is in distress. What about the child who was born yesterday to a destitute mother? What about the aged and decrepit who in the closing days of their lives are suffering the pangs of hunger? If we pass this bill in the name of destitution, taking care of 3 who are not in need, thereby caring for 1 who is in need, and pass by 8 others who are in need, then this becomes a cruel bill rather than an act which is humanitarian.

Mr. Chairman, with the burden which is ahead of this Government to aid and assist millions who are in distress, this is no time for the Government of the United States to spend more than $2,000,000,000 of the people's money under the guise of human relief when in truth and in fact three-fourths of this money goes to those who are not in want.

As regards the question of inflation, I can not believe that it is safe for Congress arbitrarily to inflate the money of this country to the extent of $2,000,000,000 for the benefit of a class. If we inflate for the benefit of one class, we must extend the same blessing to any one of a half dozen classes in this country. We must do it for agriculture, which is being foreclosed and sold on the block. It will take a minimum of $9,000,000,000 to relieve agriculture. We must grant the same blessings to the 9,000,000 unemployed people in this country. We must bestow the blessings of inflation to the millions of city home owners whose homes are being foreclosed. All of this means upward of $20,000,000,000. When the inflation is started and the people of this country become obsessed with the idea that the Government can lift the burden from the backs of the people by the magic process of printing money, we may just as well set the limit not at $2,400,000,000, as provided by this bill, but around $20,000,000,000. No one will suggest that the money of this country could be inflated at any such a proportion without bringing financial chaos and human despair such as we have not yet known.

If we can meet Government obligations by the simple process of printing money, why should we have passed the revenue bill and picked the pockets of every citizen of the country down to the child buying chewing gum; the mother buying postage stamps to send a letter to her son, who is stranded among strangers; and penalizing the poor man when he writes a check to pay his grocery bill; and further taxing every bankrupt farmer for every gallon of gasoline he pours into his tractor?

It would have been so much better to have issued a billion dollars' worth of bonds and then issued currency against them if the plan in this bill is sound. If we can meet Government obligations by issuing bonds, then issuing currency against the bonds, then, Mr. Chairman, what a wrong was perpetrated upon the American people by Washington, Lincoln, Roosevelt, and Wilson. They all bled the people for taxes in order to support the Government. It would have been so much easier to have issued bonds, then issued currency against the bonds, except that those patriots knew that that plan, which is the plan set forth in this bill, would be a fraud upon the country.

It has been suggested that there is magic to this plan because the money will be scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, yet none the less it goes to less than 4 per cent of the people. If the plan of issuing bonds and then the plan of issuing currency against them is sound, would it not have been more equal distribution and greater wisdom to have met our obligations by this plan rather than passing the revenue bill, which collects toll from every man, woman, and child in the United States? Since when is it greater wisdom and wider distribution to pass out money to 4 per cent of the people located in every section of the country than it is to refrain from reaching the hands of the Government into every pocket and taking money which is sorely needed for the maintaining of the family? [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I voted for the resolution allowing debate on the so-called bonus payments because I believe it is the sensible and patriotic thing to do. I believe we should have this discussion to-day in view of the critical condition of the country at the present time. Free, frank debate may clear the surcharged air. But I shall vote against the second paper money Patman bill. I shall vote against the Owen amendment and against any bad or cheap money scheme, any fiat, or printing-press, money or free-silver scheme. I shall vote, if given the opportunity, for a straight, honest, honorable Federal bond issue, which has been the manner by which we have paid many of our debts in the past.

I should be much pleased to vote for the Kleberg beer and bonus taxation bill, which Mr. KLEBERG will propose to-morrow, and I indorse Mr. COCHRAN'S arguments to-day for bonus-beer taxation.

This movement for payment in full of the adjusted-compensation certificates immediately arose in my city.

DETROIT FAVORS PAY NOW

Detroit, and particularly my district in that city, has registered very strongly in favor of the immediate payment in cash of the adjusted-compensation certificates of World War veterans. There have been some individual expressions of Detroiters against immediate payment, but they have been drowned out by the almost unanimous roar of approval from organizations and individuals.

The Common Council of the City of Detroit, which is fully authorized to speak for the city, passed unanimously on February 16, 1932, a resolution calling for immediate payment, and this resolution was specifically addressed to myself and other Michigan Representatives in Congress, and we were requested to give favorable consideration to Patman bill, H. R. 1, which provides for immediate payment in cash of certificates through appropriations, but not through "fiat" money.

In the last Congress Mr. PATMAN'S bill, H. R. 3493, provided only for a straight bond issue.

The common council advocated payment as a—

Measure of relief to the many veterans of the city of Detroit, as well as elsewhere, who are in serious need and whose heroic services during the World War entitle them to the most favorable consideration.

The State senate, after full consideration, on April 12 of this year, passed the Gansser resolution requesting immediate payment.

The vote was almost unanimous—29 to 1—and was also passed as a relief measure—

To provide money for paying taxes and rent, buy clothing and shoes; pay accumulated debts; provide better food and the like, thereby putting several billion dollars into immediate circulation for stimulating business nation-wide.

VETERANS DEMAND PAY

Most veterans' organizations in Michigan have declared for the immediate cash payment.

The Michigan State convention of the American Legion at Pontiac, July 1 to 4, 1931, voted in favor of immediate payment of the certificates.

It is true the American Legion national convention at Detroit last fall did not declare for immediate payment and took an adverse stand, but the Wayne County American Legion of about 52 posts, including all of those in Detroit, since that time has declared for immediate payment.

Other veterans' organizations, such as the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled Veterans' Organization, and the Veterans' Political Association in Detroit and Wayne County are 100 per cent for the payment of the certificates in full in cash immediately.

Powerful newspapers in Detroit have been advocating the cash payment in full of the certificates immediately.

Many civic, political, and business organizations have passed resolutions along the same lines.

SOME INDIVIDUALS OPPOSE

I do not recall that any organizations in Detroit have passed resolutions against the immediate cash payment of the certificates and do not believe that any have done so, although I have been notified that a few individuals in Detroit are opposed to payment immediately.

Detroit has been hit harder by the world-wide depression and panic than any other American city. It is peculiarly a manufacturing and world-trade city; and with the collapse of trade and industry Detroit, which was formerly the most prosperous city in America, the wealthiest city per capita, the city with the highest standard of wages and the highest standard of living, was stricken as if by all the Biblical plagues of Egypt.

HOW DEMAND AROSE

It seems to be true that there are more veterans in Detroit per capita than in any other city of the country. Many veterans were inclined to roam after the war, and as Detroit paid the highest wages and offered the most attractive living inducements, thousands of veterans who formerly lived in other States and communities came to Detroit.

When thrown out of work for a long period, they finally found that the only asset left to them was their adjusted-compensation certificate.

The Government allowed them certain loans on the certificate at a cruel rate of interest, 6 per cent, compounded; thus if between 1924 and 1931 the veteran borrowed between 20 per cent to 25 per cent of his certificate, he found that the 6 per cent interest compounded ate up the remaining three-fourths of his certificate.

The Government borrowed at low rates of interest and loaned to the veteran at high rates of interest. National Commander Stevens, of the American Legion, recently called this racketeering and profiteering of the worst sort, which it truly was.

INTEREST RACKETEERING

I was the first Member of Congress to protest against this unfair interest rate and took up the question at the American Legion national convention in Boston in 1930 and secured through the Michigan delegation the passage through the convention of a resolution calling for 4 per cent interest. Congress responded by cutting the interest from 6 per cent to 4½ per cent. This meant a saving of hundreds of millions of dollars to borrowing veterans.

In 1931 Congress increased the percentage which a veteran might borrow on his certificate to 50 per cent, but the 4½ per cent interest compounded would still eat up the balance due the veteran on his certificate before 1945.

I believe that these are the prime reasons for the movement among the veterans for cash payment immediately: First, the great distress of over a million veterans, and the fact that they could not pawn or borrow any more on their one remaining asset, namely, the adjusted-compensation certificate, amounting in most cases to several hundred dollars. Second, the veteran found himself caught in the clutches of the money lender by borrowing the 50 per cent, and then found that the 4½ per cent interest compounded ate up by 1945 the remaining 50 per cent, and he demanded cash payment to save his balance.

Now, let me sum up. The majority of the expressions of individuals and organizations in Detroit are strongly in favor of the payment in cash immediately of the certificates. Secondly, many of the veterans are driven by necessity to fight for the cash payment, and nearly all the other veterans who are not in dire need are sympathizing with and standing by their buddies.

CLASHING PATMAN BILLS

But now let me make clear a peculiar situation; that is, a division in the ranks of those who are fighting for cash payment of the certificates immediately.

At the opening of Congress last December Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, introduced H. R. 1, providing for the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates in cash immediately, through appropriations.

For reasons best known to himself, he changed his attitude the next month, and on January 14, 1932, he introduced a revolutionary bill entirely different in principle from H. R. 1, known as H. R. 7726. This latter is known as the flat money bill, or as a bill which turns loose the printing presses of the Treasury Department to turn out a vast sum of money not secured as fully as all United States money issued before by proper gold reserves.

CHANGING MONEY STANDARD

Thus, Mr. PATMAN traded the rights of the veterans to full cash payment immediately of their certificates for an entirely different proposition, something infinitely more vast and complicated; namely, the changing of the money system of the United States.

His bill plainly tampers with the United States dollar and its value at home and abroad. He boldly recommended an inflated money scheme and shifted from one battlefield to another.

So far as I know, Mr. PATMAN did not take into his confidence when he made the revolutionary switch from one bill to another any considerable number of the Members of Congress who had been favoring for a couple of years a straight Federal bond issue or payment through appropriations, such as his H. R. 1 provided.

I OPPOSE FIAT MONEY

Certainly Mr. PATMAN did not consult me. I have always been opposed to unreasonable issues of paper money and I have always been opposed to free silver and such other inflationary money schemes.

I believe they spell disaster to the country and that such radical steps are not justified at this time in particular. I am emphatic in my belief that Detroit, which is particularly a manufacturing and world-trade city, would be immeasurably damaged by such a violent dislocation of United States money standards. I believe it would upset our domestic and foreign trade.

I am informed that when Mr. PATMAN appeared before the House Rules Committee recently to urge consideration of H. R. 7726 and inflationary amendments to it, such as the proposal of former Senator Robert Owen, he boldly stated that now his main purpose was not primarily to secure payment in full in cash immediately of the veterans' certificates, but to back a grander and more ambitious scheme, namely, a change in our money system which he hoped would bring about tremendous reforms in economic conditions throughout the country.

Unfortunately, the hearings before the Rules Committee in which Mr. PATMAN made this alleged statement were not printed, but I am informed by Mr. MICHENER, of Michigan, a member of the Rules Committee, that he made practically this statement.

It can be clearly seen that in the new Patman bill, H. R. 7726, which he substituted for H. R. 1 on January 14 of this year, there are two distinct purposes involved: First, the payment of the certificates in full in cash immediately; and, second, the changing of the standard of value of the American dollar.

One of the objects of the latter, of course, is the same as that of free silver or any fiat-money scheme, namely, to help the debtor class.

VETERANS LOSE BY FIAT MONEY

But the Patman scheme and the Owen scheme are two-edged swords. In the case of the veteran, he is the creditor and the Government is the debtor; and if these fiat-money schemes are aimed to help the debtor, they are aimed to help in this case the United States Government. Therefore, if the Government pays the veteran's $1,000 certificate with a dollar which is worth 50 cents, 60 cents, or 70 cents, the Government really pays the veteran only $500, $600, or $700.

Mr. LAGUARDIA, of New York, was acute enough to analyze this situation, and yesterday he stated on the floor of the House that the veteran would not be paid the full value of his certificate with an inflated dollar.

It was strange to see Mr. LAGUARDIA and Secretary of the Treasury Ogden Mills, natural antagonists in fiscal matters, in agreement on this point, because Mr. Mills said before the Ways and Means Committee in testifying on the Patman bill that it provided for "a dishonest dollar." If the veteran is paid his certificate through a Federal bond issue, he gets $1,000 for a $1,000 certificate instead of the much lesser amount under the fiat scheme.

THE GOOD BEER BILL

If the veteran is paid through the Kleberg or Cochran bonus and beer for taxation amendment, he also gets $1,000 for a $1,000 certificate.

If the veteran is willing to compromise and take $500 or $600 or $700 for a $1,000 certificate, then I am quite confident a bill could be passed through Congress with the approval of the administration, settling the billions of dollars of claims through the veterans' certificates on the 50 per cent or 60 per cent or 70 per cent basis of the full value.

It would be a good bargain for the Government, because the Government and the taxpayers would save hundreds of millions of dollars and the so-called bonus cause would no longer be a football in national politics.

Of course, the boosters for the Patman bill claim that it is not fiat or printing-press money, such as that which ruined Germany and Russia and other countries which tried fiat money; but, as Mr. CELLER, of New York, pointed out to-day on the floor, the Patman and Owen fiat money is not redeemable in gold or silver, and, as Mr. CELLER stated, the definition of fiat or printing-press money the world over is that which is irredeemable in gold or silver.

LITTLE NELL CHANGES

The plan to have the adjusted-compensation certificates paid in full in cash immediately arose in Detroit. Little Nell was born in Detroit. We knew her as a straightforward girl when she appeared as a straight Federal bond issue, but we do not recognize as the same person the hussy who is now held out to us in the form of fiat or printing-press currency which is to redeem many other classes of people in the United States aside from the veterans.

Little Nell was sold "down the river," and now look how she has changed.

NO FREE SILVER

My city stands unalterably for sound money and the present standard dollar. We were violently opposed to Bryan's free-silver project which came in the middle of the panic of 1893–1898, and Detroit gave a large majority against the scheme in the elections of 1896.

We stand for sound money and we resist in times of panic schemes of other sections of the country to have unsound money or cheap money foisted upon us.

ABOLISHING GOLD STANDARD

Indeed, one of the chief backers in the House of the Patman scheme told me that the country would never be prosperous until it is thrown off the gold standard. In Detroit we think the abolition of the gold standard would bring a panic and a period of terror such as we have not yet witnessed. It would throw us out of the frying pan into the fire.

The gold standard is prescribed by law of Congress passed in 1900. If fair and honorable, you would have to change this law and before Congress could go through the process and change it, every individual who had currency or bonds or contracts payable in gold would seek to retain them in gold before the supply was exhausted. A run would take place and credit would collapse. Why use fiat money to throw the country off the gold standard?

Not only are most of our public bonds payable in gold, but most of our private bonds of American business are payable in gold. Many mortgages are payable in gold as are many contracts. All holders of these would be injured because gold would be more difficult to get.

All depositors, domestic and foreign, of course, would try while the legislation is being discussed in Congress to withdraw their gold deposits for they could exchange them later for several times their present value in dollars when the devaluation took place.

The situation is not now so terrible and hopeless that we should now hazard this dangerous experiment. We should not rock the boat.

All the tremendous reconstruction measures passed by Congress recently should have an effect to decrease unemployment and bring back prosperity.

AN UNJUSTIFIABLE SWITCH

In conclusion, it is most unfair to make the extremities of the veterans a cloak to change drastically our money system.

The sad part of the switch of Mr. PATMAN from H. R. 1 to H. R. 7726 is that the latter stands absolutely no chance of success, since it is a fiat or printing-press money scheme.

H. R. 1, as an appropriation bill, stands a better chance of passage by Congress, but yet it can not become law in the present Congress.

The Senate will probably not pass it. The President declares he will veto it.

The necessary two-thirds majority can not be obtained in the House or Senate to pass any full payment bonus bill now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK].

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means it was my pleasure to support the Patman bill embodying the Owen amendment. The magnificent address of my colleague, Captain BROWNING, of Tennessee, presents my own views and my thought upon the financial end of this question more eloquently than I can present it. I want to talk about another element and feature entering into this debate.

I listened to my leader and chieftain the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], with whom I seldom agree. I listened to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and he and I did agree in our red chase over the country, and that is about the only agreement we have had. I looked into the face of these two men as they stood here telling of the glories of the soldier. They were willing to pay him, but Shylock's bond was not yet due. They were all ready to pay. The soldier was great, he was good, he was glorious, but the bond was not yet due, and Shylock stood there and said, "Hands off," when it came to payment. May I not say to the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from New York that we have had other obligations. This may mean a revision of this contract. Did we not have the French and Italian debt-settlement bond to pay us money with 5 per cent interest, and when it came to a revision of these contracts you gentlemen, shoulder to shoulder, took from the par value of 100 cents and settled with Italy at 24 cents on the dollar, and with France at 46 cents on the dollar. You do not believe in revision now, but you revised to give away billions of the American taxpayers' money, and did you add a postscript to it in revising again? Did you know it would be necessary in 1931 to declare a moratorium and withhold from the Public Treasury $252,000,000 of the people's money? That is not all.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESLICK. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Does not the gentleman know that that money was loaned during the war to keep their armies in the field, and when they refused to pay we had to make the best settlement we could; that the only way to collect it if we did not do it was to send an army over to collect it?

Mr. ESLICK. That may be true, and these boys were there to protect the flag that your Government might live.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESLICK. Oh, I can not give up all of my time. Then there is another thing. When your Government and the States granted charters to railroads and corporations of the country, did you have any provision that when bankruptcy looked over the hills you would rush into the American Congress and form a $2,000,000,000 corporation that you might save them from insolvency? You dipped your hand into the Federal Treasury and you took $500,000,000 from it and you based a credit with the Government, and the Treasury to-day is the sole purchaser of the obligations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—$2,000,000,000 to uphold these great corporations. Gentlemen, you were willing to reform these contracts, but when the American soldier comes you were unwilling to reform his contract and pay a hungry and a needy man. Oh, you tell me how good you have been to the soldier. Yes; you worked him at a dollar a day with a $10 civilian beside him, and when you discharged that civilian you gave him a bonus of $240, and the soldier $60—not enough to buy him a new suit of clothes and a clean pair of socks.

This is the history of it. I am told what other countries have done. England gave her men a bonus of $1,427; Belgium, $492; Canada, a private $600 and officers $972; France, $249; and Uncle Sam, the richest government in all the world, gave $60, with an I O U "that I will pay you 27 years after Armistice Day."

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to divert from the sordid. We hear nothing but dollars here. I want to go from the sordid side——

(At this point Mr. ESLICK collapsed and was carried from the Chamber by his colleagues.)

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make reply to the argument of my devoted friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK], who has just left the floor. Of course, under the circumstances, I shall, as far as possible, make no reference to anything he may have said, and whatever I do say I wish to be understood it is prompted by the arguments of other gentlemen who have participated in this debate. Gentlemen say that the adoption of this bill will impose no burden upon the taxpayers of the country. I am wondering, Mr. Chairman, from whence comes this Crœsus that is to bestow $2,400,000,000 upon the American Government. I have always been taught and have so understood that for every dollar the Government spends that a dollar is collected from the people by taxation. It is not true, Mr. Chairman, that this Government has been niggardly in its treatment of the soldiers. It is not true that this Government to-day owes the ex-service men $2,400,000,000 that it will not pay. This Government never has since its formation defaulted upon a single obligation. It has not defaulted in this particular instance.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] made reference to the treatment accorded the soldiers by other powers participating in the great World War. By way of illustration, and further by way of supplementing what the gentleman said, let me call attention to what has been done by other powers that participated in the war. The United States mobilized 3,400,000 soldiers. Three hundred and sixty thousand of them were killed or wounded. Of our appropriations there is 26.1 per cent of the Budget that goes to the ex-service man. The appropriation for the present year carries $1,072,000,000 for him.

Great Britain mobilized 6,600,000 men. There were 3,000,000 killed and wounded. The appropriation that she makes for this year for all of her war obligations to her service men and their dependents is $185,457,280, or 5.8 per cent of her national budget.

France mobilized 8,410,000 men. There were killed and wounded 5,500,000, and for this year her appropriation for the care of her soldiers and their dependents is $286,722,000.

Germany mobilized 8,410,000. There were killed and wounded 5,500,000 men. The appropriation for the soldiers and their dependents for the present year is the equivalent of $286,722,000, less than one-fourth the amount appropriated by the United States.

Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, and Canada mobilized 34,190,360 men, and their total appropriation to meet obligations to their men and dependents arising out of the war is $891,190,360, 10 per cent less than that of the United States for like purpose. In the light of these facts, what becomes of the accusations of mistreatment of her soldiers made against our country?

It is not fair to the soldier and certainly it is not well for the country that he should be so grossly misinformed. He ought to be given the truth, that he might understand the meaning of what he has been led into. He does not want, or should not want, to impose upon his Government. He, in fact, is not responsible for this bill being here. He has simply permitted himself to be deceived and now is being used for somebody else's good. We all sympathize with him, but we must keep our balance in the interest of saving the country and protecting the rest of the people against the abuse carried in his demands that are embodied in this bill. This is a Government of all the people, and all the people, as a rule, love it and want to serve it, but it can not last long if we continue much longer in the direction in which we are going.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER].

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that I can not conscientiously support this legislation. It is little wonder that the American people who support this Government believe that the American Congress is inconsistent. We have saddled on the backs of the American people a tax measure involving $1,100,000,000, containing the most obnoxious nuisance taxes that have ever been levied in peace times. If we can issue bonds, why is it necessary to further discourage the revival of business that employs labor by increasing the tax burden? Why did we not issue bonds instead of passing the obnoxious tax bill? Oh, they say, "This does not cost anything." If they must sell these bonds in order to make the dollar of the value of 1926, they must pay interest on the bond. Not only that, we are paying interest for a 12-year period until these adjusted certificates come due.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I can not yield now.

We tried to balance the Budget one day and unbalance it five days afterwards. It is little wonder that the American people, who are burdened by taxation to-day, say that the American Congress is inconsistent.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I can not yield now.

If we are going to help the unemployed, let us help all of the people. Everybody could not go to war in 1917. The men who stayed at home and supported their families were just as patriotic in taking care of those who would have been a public charge had they not supported them.

I regret that I can not support this legislation. I have always voted in the interest of the veterans and their dependents, but it is ill timed now to pick out any body of citizens by class and give them preferment when there are 8,000,000 heads of families in this country who are out of employment and in need. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I realize the discussion to-day will change very few votes, because this matter has been argued for several weeks before the Ways and Means Committee and has been discussed very thoroughly among Members.

I am going to afford myself of this opportunity, due to the fact that Mr. JOHNSON, the gentleman from South Dakota, several days ago, out of order because he was going to be absent for the convention, made the statement that he absolved himself of all responsibility for any injuries, sickness, or suffering caused by reason of the bonus march on the Capitol. The responsibility for any sickness, injury, and so forth, caused by the soldiers having made this pilgrimage to Washington rests upon those Members, the leaders of this Congress, who have deliberately delayed the consideration of this measure notwithstanding the fact they realize a majority of the Members of this House, as was shown yesterday in the vote, are in favor of its passage.

Although I am one of the many new Members of this Congress, in arguing with the older Members who are the leaders here, I have always been told that it is not right and it is not proper—it is not the theory of the House that a minority should obstruct a majority. But, gentlemen, throughout this session of Congress we have beheld the unholy spectacle of these same gentlemen deliberately obstructing this progressive piece of legislation which is in the interest of all the people of the United States; and the gentleman from South Dakota is a member of this minority. Congress itself is responsible for the soldiers coming here, because the veterans realized Congress was stalling and was not giving this measure, which was so vital to them and to the entire country, the proper and fair consideration it deserves. Some of the newspapers have tried to tag the bonus march on Washington as being a communist march; but the soldiers, as they did in 1917 and 1918, when they fought for their country, by their actions now have upset that argument entirely.

There are five reasons why I am particularly anxious to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates in cash now:

First. That morally this obligation is due now; had the Government paid the veteran interest from 1917 and 1918 when the services were rendered, instead of dating that interest as of 1925, and had the Government not deducted from the base compensation the $60 which the soldier was entitled to as compensation for the clothes that the Government took from him when he enlisted, and were the Government to pay the rate of going interest which the veteran has to pay, instead of the amount that an endowment policy from a private insurance company would earn, then the adjusted-compensation certificates would be due now.

Second. If we do not pay them now, those who have borrowed one-half the face value will have nothing to collect in 1945; in fact, they will be owing money to the Government.

Third. Because the payment now, under the Patman-Owen plan for controlled expansion, will tend to bolster up commodity prices which is the first essential of normal prosperity and will provide badly needed direct relief which will be equally distributed.

Fourth. Due to the fact that credits have been contracted we must expand our currency or resort to bartering as our forefathers did.

Fifth. Because the payment will not cost the taxpayers one additional cent.

Gentlemen, here is a direct challenge to your sincerity. Here is an opportunity to pay a just debt to loyalty and sacrifice.

The passage of this bill will not in any way impair the credit of the United States. On the other hand it will do an enormous amount of good, not only to the veteran, but also to the farmer and workingman because of the fact that there will be a resultant rise in commodity prices. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the discharge of the committee and for the rule providing for the consideration of the bonus, or adjusted compensation bill, believing that those who favor this legislation were entitled to have their day in court and an opportunity to present their cause and get a vote on their bill. However, I can not vote for the measure without doing violence to my conscience and my judgment.

Three million six hundred and seventy-five thousand one hundred veterans received adjusted-compensation certificates, of which 131,355 have been matured by the death of the veterans, which leaves outstanding 3,543,745 certificates held by that number of veterans. The Government has granted loans to 2,567,367 veterans. It is estimated that banks have made advancement on 150,000 additional certificates, making 2,717,367 certificates on which loans have been made. This leaves 826,378 veterans who have borrowed nothing on their certificates, from which we are justified in assuming that they are not in need, or are probably employed, or have other resources, and therefore are not interested in this legislation. The average face value of the adjusted-compensation certificates is approximately $1,000, and so by this bill you propose to pay $826,000,000 to 826,000 veterans who do not need and have not requested such payment.

Assuming that all veterans who have borrowed on their certificates are in distress, this bill proposes the payment of $2,400,000,000 for the relief of 2,717,367 persons, which is less than one-fourth of the number of unemployed men and women in America, or a little more than 2 per cent of our entire population.

According to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the total money in circulation in the United States on June 30, 1931, was $4,821,933,293, or $38.86 per capita. The Patman bill calls for the payment of one-half of the total money in circulation in the United States to less than 3 per cent of our population. Under the Patman bill $19, or one-half of the present per capita circulation, would be required to redeem these certificates at the present time.

But it is proposed to start the presses and print $2,400,000,000 of new money to redeem these certificates, and to authorize the issue of a like amount of Government bonds when this flood of new paper money inevitably results in an abnormal and dangerous inflation. I am convinced that this plan would debase our currency, discredit our financial system, and cut in two, or reduce one-half, the value of the dollars the veterans would receive in exchange for their certificates.

I would like to give the veterans what they want. No one has more appreciation of their courage, patriotism, and sacrifices made for their country and civilization. They are entitled to the eternal gratitude of the American people. I will go as far as any red-blooded American in providing for the hospitalization, compensation, and relief of every veteran who is disabled. While these certificates are not due until 1945, I had intended to vote for their cash payment so as to aid the veterans in this emergency, and for all time to dispose of the bonus problem. But economic conditions are much worse than even the most pessimistic supposed, and are constantly getting worse. If the financial condition of the country would permit, I would gladly vote to redeem these certificates, because they are legal obligations of the Government, and I for one think the sooner the Government wipes the slate and gets rid of this exceedingly vexatious and explosive question the better it will be for all parties concerned. For these reasons I favor payment of the bonus; but not now, because the desperate condition of the country argues eloquently for delay until the frightful pall of depression is lifted.

Moreover, there is absolutely no chance for this bill to become a law at this session. I concede that it will pass the House, but no well-informed person in Washington believes that it will pass the Senate, but if it should, it will undoubtedly be vetoed by President Hoover, who has issued a public statement that if Congress passes this bill he will veto it. So you are having all of your work for nothing. I think the Members who are pushing this bill know the President will never approve it and that it can not be passed over the presitial veto. So why not be frank with the veterans and tell them that there is no chance for this bill to become a law at this session, because if it should pass both Houses the President will veto it when it reaches the White House. Why keep the veterans in suspense and in a state of expectancy when you know there is no chance for this bill to become a law at this session?

I have no quarrel with my colleagues who are supporting this measure. I concede to them the same patriotism, the same devotion to country, the same desire to do the right thing which I demand they accord to me.

My sympathies from childhood have always been with the unfortunate and the distressed. My sympathies have always been and always will be with the veterans who followed our flag, bore the burden in the heat of the day, and who made a sacrifice it would be difficult to overappraise. But under present conditions in the United States I do not believe that this measure should be enacted at this time. This bill involves the payment of $2,400,000,000 to less than 3 per cent of our population.

We are in the midst of an unprecedented depression. Practically every vocational group is on the verge of disaster. Our mills and factories are closed because there is no market for their products. Eight or ten million men and women are idle, walking the streets, seeking employment, and begging for bread. Stagnation clogs every avenue of business. The buying power of 75,000,000 people has either been destroyed or substantially reduced.

Agriculture has been broken on the rock of insolvency, and the American farmers are rapidly being reduced to penury and drifting toward a condition of peasantry. Thousands of banks have either closed their doors or are unable to perform their usual functions or extend credit to their customers. The Treasury of the United States is practically bankrupt notwithstanding its receipts amount to approximately $4,000,000,000 annually. Under the Hoover administration taxes have been tremendously increased, although the present tax load is excessive and unbearable.

Our National Budget was $900,000,000 out of balance June 30, 1931, but Hoover and Mellon were as still as a mouse about it, and not one person in 10,000 ever heard about the $900,000,000 deficit which the administration paid by issuing bonds. The deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, will be approximately $3,000,000,000, and to balance the books and defray its ordinary expenses for the last 12 months, the Government has been compelled to borrow approximately $3,000,000,000 in addition to our enormous national income. Do the American people realize that for the last nine months of the Hoover administration the Treasury Department has been borrowing on an average $300,000,000 monthly? When the Government is running $10,000,000 in debt every day it seems to me that we should hesitate a long time before assuming the immediate payment of an additional $2,400,000,000 on account of these certificates.

No matter what your views may be as to the propriety of having originally issued these adjusted-compensation certificates, we can not escape the fact that they were issued and are a legal obligation of the Government, though, by their terms, not payable until 1945. Now, if conditions were normal, if we were not in the midst of an unprecedented depression with no prospect of an early improvement in economic conditions, if the agricultural, industrial, and other vocational groups were enjoying even a moderate degree of prosperity, if our national income had not shrunk tremendously, if the revenues of the Government would furnish funds to meet this obligation, if the economic forces of the Nation were not paralyzed, if the people were able to pay additional taxes, if a safe and sane method of meeting and discharging this obligation were presented, one which would not involve us in more troublesome economic complications, then I would vote to redeem these adjusted-service certificates with cash, not only to help the veterans but on the theory that these certificates will have to be paid some time, and the sooner we pay and get them behind us, the better it will be for the Government and all parties concerned.

However, under present conditions I am convinced that the enactment of the pending bill and the immediate payment of the bonus will strain to the breaking point our financial and economic structures. To my way of thinking the issue of paper money and Government bonds to the amount of $2,400,000,000 to liquidate these bonus certificates will seriously threaten the integrity, efficiency, and usefulness of our financial system, unsettle business, strain, or perhaps wreck our security market, breed distrust, intensify existing timidity and fear, discredit and debase our currency, and drive our capital into hiding to such an extent as to paralyze productive industry and halt, or indefinitely delay, the return of normal conditions.

I am convinced that conditions will continue to get worse unless and until the buying power of the common people is restored, which can only be done by a stabilization of the market price of commodities on a higher level, especially farm products, that will not only return the cost of production but a reasonable profit over and above such production costs. The pending bill will not produce a natural, normal, or helpful expansion of our circulating medium, but a quick, mushroom, high-pressure inflation, the after effects of which will, in my opinion, be injurious to the country.

I am opposed to an inflation of our currency, but I favor a gradual and controlled expansion, which is a delicate undertaking and should not be attempted by rash or indirect methods, or under the guise of liquidating the obligations of the Federal Government to the World War veterans.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], whose ability and accomplishments as a legislator I admire and respect, stated that the payment of the soldier bonus was only an incidental purpose of this legislation and that its main objective is the $2,400,000,000 expansion of our currency. If such expansion is necessary or desirable, why resort to this circuituous method? Why not present a bill, the avowed purpose of which is to bring about this expansion? A healthy, helpful, and permanent expansion of the currency and a consequent increase in commodity prices can not be brought about by the hocus-pocus, willy-nilly process proposed in the pending bill.

Moreover, I think this bill, if enacted, will hurt more than help the World War veterans as a class. It is unfortunate that this legislation is presented at a time when financial and economic conditions make it practically impossible to grant the veterans the desired relief. This legislation runs counter to public opinion. It is inopportune. If enacted, it will generate a spirit of hostility which I fear will be reflected in legislation making a drastic reduction of benefits to disabled veterans. There is a nation-wide sentiment in favor of dealing generously with all veterans, and with double generosity with those who are disabled. But there is a limit to the tax load which the American people can carry, especially in times like these.

If you should secure the enactment of this law, the reaction and aftereffects will not be beneficial to the veterans. Its enactment will augment the rapidly growing opposition to our present liberal policy toward our war veterans and their dependents. I hope this will not be the result, because this Nation can not afford to be parsimonious in dealing with those who were disabled in the service. But if the demands of those who hold the adjusted-service certificates are unreasonable and excessive, there will be a revulsion of public opinion, which might force a too-radical and drastic reduction of compensation benefits. If the credit of the Government is strained to the breaking point to redeem the adjusted-compensation certificates, the Government may be compelled to reduce hospitalization, compensation, and disability benefits, which would work a hardship on the disabled veterans and their dependents. I am sure the nondisabled veterans who hold adjusted-service certificates will not insist on the immediate cash redemption of their certificates if such action would directly or indirectly cause a reduction in the hospitalization and compensation benefits of their comrades who are disabled. While not so intended by the holders of the adjusted-service certificates, I am convinced that the immediate payment of these certificates will work an injury to their disabled comrades.

If I can read the signs of the times, I make bold to say that, in my humble opinion, the holders of these adjusted-service certificates are crowding the American people a little too hard and too far, and are thereby injuring their own cause and making it more difficult for them to obtain adequate hospitalization, compensation, and disability benefits in the future. The full force of this reaction will fall on the disabled veterans and their dependents who are now the beneficiaries of the Nation's gratitude and generosity.

I have been a champion of just, liberal allowances to our veterans. I am their friend, and a true friend will unflinchingly stand by you when you are right and will tell you frankly when you are wrong, or about to adopt a policy which will be harmful to you in the future. I am trying to look around the corner and see the effects that will follow the enactment of this legislation. I am convinced that within a year the vast majority of World War veterans will realize that the demand for the immediate payment of the bonus at this time of nation-wide economic distress is a mistaken and short-sighted policy, which will not only cripple the Government but in the long run seriously injure the cause of the veterans.

The United States Government is paying the penalty for having muddled the bonus question, not once but often. In 1920, before I entered Congress, a settlement could have been made for $1,250,000,000. We have already paid $1,514,305,052 and still owe $2,400,000,000. What we have paid and what we still owe amounts to $3,914,305,052, which is $2,664,305,052 more than the bonus demands could have been settled for in 1920. The chance to make another good settlement was lost when Harding vetoed the bonus bill. The bonus issue again became acute in 1924, at which time the Ways and Means Committee estimated that the veterans' demands could be settled for $2,000,000,000. But Congress again refused to make a cash settlement and forced the veterans to accept certificates maturing in 1945.

On these certificates we have already paid $1,514,305,052, and still owe $2,400,000,000. So the adjusted compensation act will cost the American people $3,914,305,052, or nearly $2,000,000,000 more than the bonus claims could have been settled for in 1924, when the Republican organization in Congress, with whip and spur, forced the adjusted compensation law through Congress, in disregard of the wishes of the veterans, who asked for cash and not an insurance certificate payable in 20 years. If the Democratic plans had been adopted in 1920 or 1924 the Nation would have saved $2,000,000,000 and the bonus question would now be ancient history and out of our way.

When the bonus question was pending in Congress in 1923–24, I contended that if the United States Government owed the veterans anything it should make payment in cash, just as it made settlement with its other creditors. But by a policy of evasion and delay, the Government was maneuvered into a position where it admitted an indebtedness and issued its promise to pay approximately $4,000,000,000 in 1945, which was double the amount of cash the veterans would have accepted in 1924.

In 1920 the prosperity incident to the World War still continued; business was flourishing and billions of dollars flowed into the National Treasury. The Government at that time could easily have paid $1,250,000,000 and the bonus question would have been settled for all time. In 1924, when the World War Adjusted Compensation act was passed, the country was very prosperous, and the Government was collecting billions of dollars in revenue. At that time the bonus demands could have been settled for $2,000,000,000, which amount could have been paid without the people feeling the tax, and without causing even so much as a ripple on our financial seas. By making the kind of settlement that was made in 1924 the Government became obligated for $2,000,000,000 more than the veterans at that time demanded in settlement of their bonus claims.

Now, I repeat, the Government is stewing in its own grease because it did not frankly and fairly deal with the veterans when their claim for adjusted compensation was presented in 1920 and 1924. The Government could have settled with the veterans at that time for a small fraction of what we will ultimately pay to liquidate these adjusted-service certificates.

By a lack of courage and vision, and as a result of unnecessary and unwise delays, the Government maneuvered itself into a position that will compel it to pay $2,000,000,000 more than would have been required to settle these bonus claims in 1920 or 1924. Because these successive postponements and half-baked settlements have been so costly to the Government, I favor the liquidation of these certificates just as soon as an improvement in economic conditions will supply the necessary funds. The Government has confessed this debt and issued its obligations therefor. Every partial settlement, every equivocal adjustment but adds to the ultimate liabilities of the United States. But for the reasons that I have mentioned I am convinced that the passage of this bill at this time would be extremely unwise. I shall therefore vote "no" when the bill is put on its final passage, confident that my action will sooner or later be approved, not only by the great majority of the American people but by a large majority of veterans who, on sober second thought, will persuade themselves that the enactment of this legislation at this time would be a mistake.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of standing in recess.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House meets to-morrow the pending bill be the unfinished business to be considered to-morrow as of to-day; that consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, in order to-morrow, be dispensed with and that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning; that consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, in order to-morrow, be dispensed with; and that the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates be in order to-morrow as the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. NOLAN, for one week, on account of business.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore at 1.35 o'clock p. m.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE EDWARD E. ESLICK

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the sad announcement that our distinguished and beloved colleague, Representative EDWARD E. ESLICK, of Tennessee, has passed away. He died at his post of duty while addressing the House in favor of the pending bill providing for the payment of adjusted-service certificates.

I have in my hand a portion of the speech which he had prepared as a conclusion, and I ask unanimous consent that his remarks may be extended in the RECORD by inserting the remainder of his speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. ESLICK. The 4,300,000 World War veterans were the flower of our manhood. They were our fighting men, picked from 24,000,000 within the draft age. They turned their faces to the east to fight upon the fields where the master warriors—Napoleon and Wellington—had battled more than a hundred years ago. They went from the fields of peace to the shambles of the bloody battlefields of modern war.

They went to battle that free government might live, that world civilization might continue, and human happiness exist. The destiny of mankind was intrusted to them, and they did not betray that trust. They carried with them a courage that proclaimed new military tactics to the Old World—that the American soldier knew how to advance, but never knew the code of retreat.

When they started over there, our people blessed them and promised them a home and the best when they returned—their places would be waiting for them. Some of them did not return. They are sleeping "over there." Many of them came back. Washington, the Capital City, greeted them, the great and victorious American Army, as they marched down Pennsylvania Avenue. Immortal Woodrow Wilson reviewed them.

Soon the tumult and the shouting died away and their places were not given back to them. Their jobs were gone. They must take up the broken thread of life again. They started anew on life's unfinished road. They have passed 13 mileposts since Armistice Day.

And there was another parade on Pennsylvania Avenue. There was no President, no Commander in Chief, to review the ragged remnants of Pershing's own. As the shadows of the night fell, the shadows of the greatest American Army came; as one writer says, "the ghosts of war-time glory," paraded again. These men were among the victors in the battles of war—but defeated in the battles of civil life. They were the representation of a million of their buddies in the great army of the wholly unemployed—hungry, down and out—and another half million of their buddies employed from one to three days a week. These men come to the American Congress and say, "You paid everybody else in cash—we ask no chairty. Be fair! Be fair to us!"

You say this is sentiment. I answer, yes; and ours is a patriotic, a sentimental people. Patriotism is born of sentiment. The monuments to the heroic dead proclaim the sentiment of our people. Bread for the living when hungry is a greater sentiment than stones for the dead. The payment of the veterans' certificates, which means bread to them and their families, is worth more than all the pomp and glory and flowers by the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

For one I shall vote that the veterans may have whatever comfort the payment of the balance of their certificates will bring to them.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is with the deepest sorrow that I announce the sudden passing of my colleague, the Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, of Tennessee. His death, occurring upon the floor of the House in the midst of a speech, came as a distinct shock to every Member of the House.

He was beloved and esteemed by every Member of the House, just as he was beloved and esteemed by every citizen in his State. No man was better known in Tennessee than ED ESLICK. No man was better loved in that State for his many splendid qualities of both mind and heart. For many years he has been prominent in the councils of the State, and when he came here as a Member in this House he quickly won a warm place in the hearts and in the affections of all his colleagues.

He was one of the most lovable characters I have ever known. I loved him devotedly, and this is true of every member of his delegation. He was quiet and reserved, but always sympathetic. He was a close student and a lover of the best in literature, and was one of the best-informed men I knew on every public question. He was an able and faithful representative of his people, and there is not one of them who will not feel a personal loss in his death.

On behalf of the entire House, I wish to extend the sincerest sympathy to Mrs. Eslick, his devoted and understanding wife, who was not only a comfort to him but a great help in his every undertaking.

He died as I know he would have preferred to die—here upon the floor of the House, the scene of his labors for a number of years and in the active discharge of his duties.

The Congress, the Nation, his State, and his congressional district have suffered a great loss in his passing.

Mr. Speaker, I need say no more, and I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 265

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1932

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., LL. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, who art revealed not only in the power that has scattered worlds like dust of gold through the heavens but also in the silent force that chains the stars; renew in us the sense of Thy presence in the mysterious life which lives in human thought, creates the worlds of imagination, and images perfection, that in Thy companionship we may walk as children of light. Unbosom Thine own Self to us in the love that toils and weeps and bleeds for the sorrows of mankind, that by this inward revelation we may be guided and inspired. Kindle our minds with thoughts divine, open wide the doors of our hearts, that we may welcome Thee as Master of our lives. Speak Thou through our lips to-day, that in this hour of serving Thee we may have peace and joy and fellowship one with another. We ask it through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Whereas prompt and sound action by Congress is very necessary in the matters mentioned in order that confidence and normal business conditions may be restored; and

Whereas all revenues may not be received in the full amount anticipated under the new revenue act of 1932 passed by Congress during this month: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Broadway Association respectfully request that Congress take action in its present session as follows:

First. Materially reduce the cost of the Federal Government.

Second. Balance the Budget.

Third. Provide an additional source of revenue through immediate modification of the Volstead Act.

Fourth. Repeal the eighteenth amendment.

President Broadway Association (Inc.).

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN COMMUNISTS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that a letter from Edwin S. Bettelheim, jr., adjutant general of the Military Order of the World War, may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

JUNE 14, 1932.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In order to avoid a multiplicity of mail to each of the individual Senators, I am asking you if you will be good enough to transmit this message from the Military Order of the World War by way of inserting this communication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We wish to advise our Senators from the various States that the Military Ordea of the World War, with its chapters disbursed throughout the States, is heartily in favor of the Dies bill (H. R. 12044) providing for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists.

The delegates from the various chapters at the national convention assembled have urged the early adoption of the bill by the Congress in order to keep America for Americans.

Very sincerely yours,

EDWIN S. BETTELHEIM, Jr.,
Adjutant General.

EFFECT OF ECONOMY BILL ON RURAL CARRIERS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from W. G. Armstrong, president National Rural Letter Carriers Association, setting out the inequalities in the economy bill as it affects the rural carriers of the country.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NILES, MICH., June 15, 1932.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ODDIE: Fearful there still may be some Member of Congress who does not fully appreciate the injustice of the Senate furlough plan as it applies to the 41,597 rural letter carriers of the country, I am availing myself of your considerate invitation to make a summation of the position of the National Rural Letter Carriers Association, together with an itemization of the communications I have directed on behalf of our membership of 39,556.

The National Rural Letter Carriers Association, from the outset, has firmly taken the position that any reduction in Government salaries would be a shortsighted policy, diminishing the purchasing power of the country on one hand and, on the other, causing governmental chieftains who take such scrupulous care of private contracts to virtually repudiate their much more solemn contract with its own employees.

Nevertheless our membership, composed as it is of a cross section of the most patriotic and conscientious Americans that can be found in the land, is keen enough to comprehend the problems facing our national legislators, and regardless of our convictions we have silently followed the perplexing and complex economy problems with which Congress has been wrestling.

We don't want a salary reduction. We know Congress doesn't want us to have one; and if we get one, it will be because it is the best judgment of Congress that such an act is imperative. That we know.

If a kind and liberal father had come to any one of us when we were boys and regretfully informed us he was pinched in finances and must cut our allowance, any selfish protest on our part on this score would have been highly inappropriate. So when Uncle Sam comes to us, pleading serious financial embarrassment, we are resigned to take whatever congressional medicine handed us with our customary service smile.

But Congress purposes to prescribe one kind of medicine for the vast majority of Government employees and an entirely different and more biting variety for all rural letter carriers.

The Government worker with a $2,100 salary is being asked under the furlough plan to give up $175 in exchange for 30 days' vacation. The rural letter carrier with a 34-mile route, drawing a basic salary of $2,100, is being asked to sacrifice $247.35, or $72.35 more, in exchange for but 15 days' vacation.

Our position on this proposed discrimination has been one of violent opposition ever since it was first forwarded to the House Economy Committee by the White House.

On April 14 we forwarded a letter to President Herbert Hoover, in which we forcefully outlined how the furlough plan was unfair to the carrier body.

On April 15 we addressed a protest to every Member of Congress, sharply contrasting the economy contribution proposed for all Government employees except rural letter carriers, citing figures to prove that as high as 27.57 per cent of a rural carrier's income would be taken from him under the furlough plan.

On April 16 a statistical table showing in detail the discrimination of the furlough plan as it applies to rural carriers was printed in our official organ and sent to every Member of Congress.

On May 21 we addressed a lengthy brief to the Senate Economy Committee, thoroughly covering the discouraging outlook for rural carriers if so drastic a deduction is made under the furlough plan.

On June 11, when we observed that the furlough plan evidently was being held in high esteem by some of the Senate and House conferees on the economy amendment, we hastened another general letter to all Members of Congress, "protesting vigorously the discrimination of the furlough plan," and pleading that the three-eighths in the present amendment be changed to nine-sixteenths.

On June 12 we circulated a mimeographed table among Members of Congress, again showing in detail the discrimination of the furlough plan as it applies to rural carriers.

On June 13 Representative JOHN COCHRAN, of Missouri, who has not a single rural carrier in his district, was forcibly impressed by the gross injustice proposed to be inflicted on rural carriers under the furlough plan, and he had inserted in the RECORD a plea in our behalf supported by a statistical table.

On June 14 Senator SAM G. BRATTON, of New Mexico, who steadfastly has stood for equitable salary reduction, had the same material inserted in the Senate RECORD.

We now feel that Congress is completely informed of the unhappy situation of rural carriers under the furlough plan as it passed the Senate.

Furthermore, we are heartened to the extent that we are confident that Congress will not countenance this discrimination.

If Congress finally decides that the furlough plan is the most expeditious method of economizing on Government salaries we merely implore that rural carriers be paid nine-sixteenths of their equipment allowance for the next fiscal year instead of three-eighths as now provided.

Thanking you for this opportunity of restating our position and enumerating the actions taken on behalf of our membership, we are,

Sincerely yours,

THE NATIONAL RURAL LETTER CARRIERS ASSOCIATION,
By W. G. ARMSTRONG, National President.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 15, 1932.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

MISS JOSEPHINE ROCHE, NEW TYPE OF INDUSTRIAL LEADER

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, Colorado is a State of mystical and matchless mountains, and fertile valleys, and plains. It is the birthplace of rivers which bind together sunrise and sunset seas. It is a vast storehouse of marble, silver, gold, and other precious natural resources. But above all its other possessions it rightly values its citizens and rejoices when the paths taken by its men, women, and children lead to eminence.

Among the State's leaders of the younger generation is one who has advanced to merited national prominence by self-sacrificing courage and human vision in one of our country's most disorganized and inefficient industries.

Without specifying her other fine activities, Miss Josephine Roche, of Denver, is entitled to particular mention for significant contributions to wholesome industrial relations. She is not only unique as an able and efficient president of a large operating Colorado coal company but also because she brought to her difficult task a program of voluntary cooperation for labor and capital, the virtues of which she has increasingly demonstrated. She is a prophet of a new and wiser social order. She practices the industrial democracy she preaches, and she preaches with penetrating and discriminating intelligence. In recognition of her qualities and services Smith College, one of New England's best known educational institutions, is this month justly planning to confer on Miss Roche an honorary degree.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio address delivered in Colorado in the spring of this year by Miss Roche. It gives some indications of the essential nature of her industrial message.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUMAN VALUES AND BUSINESS PROGRESS

No previous generation, probably, has been so perplexed, so driven, as ours, but none has ever been justified in holding higher hopes if it could but reconcile itself to making a brave and judicious use of its growing resources, material and intellectual. Intelligence has well been called "the untested hope" in its application to human welfare. No one would deny, it has been well said, that intelligence is the light of the world, the chief glory of mankind, but we dread its indifference to respectable opinions and to what we deem the "well-tried wisdom of the ages." It has taken several centuries to bring intelligence to a comparatively free functioning in the field of natural science, where it has produced marvelous results. Employed in regard to rocks and stars, plants and animals, and in the investigation of mechanical and chemical processes, intelligence has completely reversed man's notions of the world and opened new vistas of power and progress. But the process of emancipating natural science from the bondage of prejudice, taboo, and tradition was long and painful and filled with sacrifices.

In the field of economics and human relations the application of intelligence is in its first stages. On no other basis, surely, can our present situation of economic chaos and human misery be explained. As we review our third winter of unparalleled depression, with vast numbers of our citizens on a disaster relief basis, facing facts and the application of intelligence to them becomes our only hope. Too frequently our personal discontent does not extend to any critical questioning of the general situation in which we find ourselves. Those who reassure us by insisting that the good old times will come again, we are all too quick to honor and respect; those who disturb us with searching criticism and suggestions of new efforts are too often objects of our suspicion. A great modern historian has said: "There have been obstructionists in all times, busily if unconsciously engaged in ratifying existing ignorance and mistakes and discouraging creative thought!" These persons are very busy to-day in the field of social and economic relations.

To-day's so-called crisis is not a thing emerging suddenly but is the culmination of economic developments and conditions which have long been in evidence and pointing clearly to the present outcome. But for the most part the American people have refused to heed these warnings, preferring to be misled as to the country's real condition, and to be dazzled by the feverish and superficial spectacle of stock-market fortunes, and by the vast gains of a specially privileged few. Only, it would seem, when social ills have been dramatized by spectacular suffering and by enormity in their extent, do we arouse ourselves, and then too often it is only for purposes of immediate alleviation rather than for intelligent and constructive dealing with causes.

The amazingly swift mechanical and scientific advances of the past few years have multiplied, through machinery, the productivity of industry. And human labor to-day, even when not displaced by the machine, is receiving less and less proportionately of its share in this increased production. Department of Commerce figures, for example, show that from 1920 to 1926 the aggregate output of workers in industry increased 34 per cent, but the volume of wages of workers decreased 30 per cent and that in the decade ending in 1929, while real wages increased only 13 per cent, the returns to all industry increased 72 per cent and dividends on industrial and rail stocks increased by 285 per cent, twenty-two times as fast as wages. During eight years, 1920–1928, the portion of the national income received by persons in the income group of $2,000 a year or less dropped from 20 per cent to 6⅓ per cent; while in this same period, according to Internal Revenue Bureau figures, individuals each with net incomes of over $1,000,000 a year grew from 33 to 513. The wage loss of workers in 1930, as compared with 1929, was reported to be $9,000,000,000. At the end of 1931 it was estimated at about $20,000,000,000 below 1929.

If we use intelligence, if we think at all, we must realize that prosperity comes only when goods are sold; goods are sold when people have money to buy; and the people who chiefly make the markets are the farmers, the wage earners, the small-salaried men and women who constitute over 80 per cent of our public. Only as their buying power is adequate can products be sold and business be restored.

Those of us who wish to build rather than to tear down, to conserve rather than uproot, to save rather than waste human, scientific, and economic values, must accept the task of patiently pointing out the facts, of opening minds, whenever possible, to an acceptance of truth, and to a willingness to apply in the field of industry and economics the knowledge and intelligence which have, in the field of natural science, liberated and so vastly aided mankind.

Talking about things usually is very much easier than doing things—and people often applaud social utterances while they shrink from identification with, or open approval of, any activity based on an application of those utterances. To-day it is an encouraging sign that people are beginning not only to demand facts, but to think in terms of constructive industrial policies and methods. Public support is more and more being given to those business concerns committed to policies bringing security both to investors and workers.

This is not the time to review even briefly some of the incidents in modern industrial experience which show this trend of public opinion, but they are numerous. The experience of the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co. is an illustration. It is now being generally discussed throughout the country in business, professional, and financial circles, as well as by educators, workers, and farmers.

The Rocky Mountain Fuel Co., operating six mines, is the second largest coal company in Colorado. It is the largest producer of lignite coal in the State, and the only coal company in the northern field with mines on all railroads.

Slightly more than four years ago the company announced its present industrial policy. That policy is based on recognition of the public interest involved in mining and marketing coal, on fair market practices, and on union-labor contracts, under which cooperation has been substituted for hostility and waste. Long years of warfare between coal operators and miners have been the story of Colorado's coal industry, and when the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co. took this action of union recognition it marked a complete reversal of the company's previous attitude, which had been similar to the wasteful and antisocial practices prevalent in the industry, not only in Colorado but generally. Meeting with the coal miners' union delegates in 1928, the company signed with them a declaration under which it has operated ever since, the preamble of which reads:

"We, the signers of this document, seeking a new era in the industrial relations in Colorado, unite in welcoming this opportunity to record the spirit and principles of this agreement.

"Our purposes are:

"To promote and establish industrial justice;

"To substitute reason for violence, confidence for misunderstanding, integrity and good faith for dishonest practices, and a union of effort for the chaos of the present economic warfare;

"To avoid needless and wasteful strikes and lockouts through the investigation and correction of their underlying causes;

"To establish genuine collective bargaining between mine workers and operators through free and independent organization;

"To stabilize employment, production, and markets through cooperative endeavor and the aid of science, recognizing the principle that increased productivity should be mutually shared through the application of equitable considerations to the rights of workers and to economic conditions affecting the operators and the business of the company;

"To assure mine workers and operators continuing mutual benefits, and consumers a dependable supply of coal at reasonable and uniform prices;

"To defend our joint undertaking against every conspiracy or vicious practice which seeks to destroy it, and in all other respects to enlist public confidence and support by safeguarding the public interest."

What have been the concrete results of this union management cooperation? Can a program succeed, based as ours is on a recognition of the rights of the public, of the rights of investors to a fair return on money invested, and of the rights of workers to independent organization, fair wages and security? The facts speak for themselves:

First. Operating costs have steadily been reduced. A decrease of 26 cents per ton since the company's present policy was put into effect has resulted from the new relations between miners and management.

Second. Production and sales have increased during a period when State coal production has shown a steady drop. In 1931, while Colorado's coal tonnage declined 21 per cent below 1930, the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co. not only maintained but increased its production 2.4 per cent. The average number of days worked by all mines in the State was 144. The company's six mines averaged 180 days; its 5 northern field mines 198 days, or 54 more days than the State average, and the public has responded to this general welfare policy.

Third. Improved production and business have been achieved while miners' incomes have been safeguarded at approximately $1,800 a year.

Further, the communities in which the mines operate have had an appreciable share in the beneficial results of the joint program. The high wages paid are spent in markets for goods and products of factories and farms to the immediate business advantage of the State and region in which they operate.

Equally important with the fair wage scale, and basically essential to such results as ours, is the recognition of mutual rights. Out of such recognition, voluntary on both sides, has come the relationship which is to-day translating into realities the words of the contract. Meeting together as free parties and with the same end in view of a joint task, the frequent conferences held between miners' union committees and company officials, superintendents, department heads, and salesmen have resulted in many valuable suggestions for improved operating methods, and for extension of markets. The miners not only produce coal but also help market that coal. They tell the story to their communities of what union-mined coal means to miners and the community. They point out, for example, that their union wage scale has distributed nearly one and a quarter million dollars a year in their communities; and that they and the company jointly have endeavored to prevent unfortunate and wasteful reductions of miners' wages and purchasing power long familiar in other sections.

The fact that the business soundness as well as human decency of the joint enterprise has been proved has aroused widespread interest, and expressions of many economists and progressive leaders in industry declare that we are demonstrating the practicality of new values, new standards, and new relations in industry.

LEGISLATIVE ABILITY IN CONGRESS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD an article by Dr. Arthur MacDonald, of the city of Washington, entitled "Legislative Ability in Congress," including a study of the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

LEGISLATIVE ABILITY IN CONGRESS, INCLUDING A STUDY OF THE SENATE OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS

(By Dr. Arthur MacDonald, Washington, D. C., formerly fellow of Johns Hopkins University)

In at least three-fourths (probably nine-tenths of cases) the Members of Congress who are most active, and also most successful in getting bills enacted into law, resolutions passed, and amendments adopted show the most legislative acumen or ability. There are always exceptions to this rule, but they only prove the rule. In general, a Member who introduces a bill and gets it enacted into law must devote much attention to the bill in the different stages through which it must pass before being enacted into law. This study is not concerned about the nature of the bill, resolution, or amendment, whether good or bad. A bill that subsequently proved to be a bad one might require more ability to get enacted into law than a good bill. In short, and in the long run, legislative success amounts to legislative ability, as in business it is the delivery of the goods that decides.

The method of estimating legislative ability, to be considered, and as illustrated in Tables 1 and 2, will be found not to be arbitrary but to be based on actual results, and where that is not possible, upon the experience of those who have been long connected with both House and Senate.

SKEPTICISM AS TO ESTIMATING LEGISLATIVE ABILITY

While it may be admitted that, in general, legislative success spells legislative ability, yet there may be much skepticism as to estimating such success or ability by any method of calculation.

In any new effort in a line of study, especially when made for the first time anywhere, whether meritorious or not, there naturally arises some skepticism which may go so far as to make such study appear to be a freak. But most all new lines of research may be liable to be considered as very doubtful, if not visionary or freakish, and some are; but the mere fact of their newness is, of course, no proof of this.

The older Members of Congress form more or less of a club, or are like classmates in college; they know each other well; especially is this true in the Senate. If any experienced Member should be asked to name the first 20, 30, or 50 men in Congress who are doing most of the legislative work he would find little difficulty in telling. Though, in certain cases, there might be some difference of opinion, the great majority of the names mentioned would be undisputed. Such a general agreement as to who are doing most of the legislative work in Congress can not only be expressed in words but can be estimated approximately (though perhaps roughly) in figures. If there be some doubt here, it may be stated that in the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress, which the author studied (a study of the United States Senate, published in Metron (International Journal of Statistics), Padova, Italy, 1923, 80, 23 pages; also by the Anthropological Society of Bombay, India; also in Spanish in Revista Argentina de Ciencias Politicas are VIII, t. 15, Buenos Aires, Argentina), those most experienced and least liable to be prejudiced were asked to name the first 30 Senators who were doing most of the work in the Senate. Comparing the lists named with the list based upon the author's estimate, depending upon percentages of legislative results, there was very little difference practically. The same method of estimating legislative ability is used here, with the addition of allowing something for initial legislative activity, which was not done in the former study.

In talking with Members the author has noticed in a few a tendency (which is natural and probably unconscious) to base their opinion of estimating legislative ability mainly upon their own experience; this is instructive, and to a certain extent desirable, from the point of view of science. It seemed to be assumed that the purpose was an exact estimate of legislative ability, which, of course, is not the case; in fact, it is probably impossible to make an exact estimate; though this be true, it does not follow that a rough approximate estimate may not be made.

To estimate legislative ability in Congress is easier than to determine standing of students in college, because in Congress more data are recorded upon which the estimate is based.

It sometimes happens that a Member introduces a bill which is reported and passed by the House and reported in the Senate, but fails to become law because of late report by the committee or too much pressure for other bills, or shortness of session, or filibuster. The bill was a good one; there really was no serious objection to it, and in a normal course of events would have become law. Later the same bill, with few changes, is introduced by a member of the opposite party who have come into control of Congress. The bill is enacted into law, and the Member who first introduced it and is the real author gets no credit for it. But this is a very exceptional case, and only strengthens the general rule that Members must work continually for their bills if they expect other Members to help to enact them into law.

Another Member introduced a bill, a copy of which was incidentally sent to the White House, and was returned with the approval of the President. It was, therefore, made in committee a part of a large general bill which was reported out in the name of the chairman of the committee, who introduced the general bill. Of course, the real author of this bill, which was inserted into the general bill, received no credit publicly. But there are many Members with such legislative ability whose good work in different committees is not known generally, and for which no credit can be given by any method of estimating legislative ability. In fact, these able Members are not seeking personal credit but are only desirous to help all they can in enacting good laws. This, in fact, is the experience of many of the best men in Congress, and is generally so distributed that it is fair to all, or almost all, and, not being possible to estimate it, it can be omitted. These gentlemen are often chairman of important committees or leaders in their party, and have special opportunity to receive credit, by virtue of their high position and standing, for reporting of bills, or making motions and amendments, or for number of subjects discussed and frequency of remarks on floor, all of which are given due credit in Table 2 for initial legislative activities. These special opportunities for receiving credits serve to a large extent as an offset to the good work chairman and leaders do in committee, for which no credit is recorded.

THE MERIT OF SENIORITY

But some Member may say that high positions as leaders, and chairmen of committees, are due mainly to being in Congress a long time; that is, to seniority, and are not due to any special ability. It is true that the seniority of itself gives many advantages and has much weight. But seniority, in nine cases out of ten, has much merit, for it depends mainly and ultimately on legislative success and political ability. For any Member to so act in Congress and at home, as to receive the majority of votes of his district or State for many years, shows political and legislative insight, which means ability, that consists in so adapting himself to both his congressional and district environment as to have the voters choose him to represent them, time and again, and this often, in spite of strong opponents in nomination in the primary, as well as in the election, who watch all of his work in Congress, always emphasizing and publishing his defects and mistakes in his district or State, but seldom or never mentioning the good work he does in Congress; yet he still remains, and often withstands even a political landslide against his own party.

The people instinctively know him, and sooner or later his opponents become weary of attacking him, though they usually are alert for any opportunity to criticize him. Such seniority shows legislative ability and political sagacity; legislative ability is put first, for any mistakes here are more serious and sure to be published, and often embellished for home consumption, and, whatever effect legislative errors produce, it reaches more the leading voters of the community who can usually influence the people, if they so desire, but often, to their credit, do not make the effort, as they prefer to let well enough alone in politics and not take chances on what an unknown opponent will do in Congress, not to mention the fact that a new Member must start at the bottom and is usually not able to accomplish much at first.

In short, it may be said that politics is a specialty, and to be successful in it, as in any specialty, ability and experience are required. There are exceptions, but again they only emphasize the rule. The conclusion is that seniority is, in the last analysis, almost wholly based upon legislative ability and political acumen, and whatever advantage it affords in an estimate of legislative ability should be given due credit.

It sometimes happens, but rarely, that a district will replace its Representative in Congress by a man whom they acknowledge is inferior. But their reason is that they prefer a man who represents them to one who does not, though he be superior; that is, a Representative or Senator must be a good politician as well as a statesman. The author once asked a distinguished Senator (to whom he had written a letter) if he had received the letter. The Senator said, "There are more than 300 unanswered letters upon my desk; for three weeks all my time has been required to defend the President as his spokesman."

Through such neglect of his correspondence (not to mention the want of a good secretary who could answer most of his letters) he had made so many discontented in his State that some time before election he announced that he would not be a candidate for reelection. Knowing that he would have strong opposition, he preferred this course to taking chances of closing a long and distinguished public service by defeat. So he gracefully, and doubtless wisely, retired with honor. Yet, everyone, including his opponents, acknowledged that his statesmanship was of the highest order. Thus again it is seen that seniority required good politics as well as high-class statesmanship, and, as already noted, the legislative activities from advantages growing out of seniority should have due credit.

In Table 1 is given the main basis upon which legislative success or, in general, ability is estimated. The estimate is based upon the difficulty in getting bills reported, through either House, or enacted into law, or resolutions or amendments adopted; in short, the difficulty of getting results in any of the legislative stages through which any kind of bill or resolution or amendment may pass.

Table 1 is divided into two parts, one part giving the percentages of bills introduced which are enacted into law (column 5) or reported (column 1) or passed Senate (column 2), or House (column 3), or both Houses (column 4); also percentages of amendments, motions or resolutions introduced which are adopted (column 6).

The second part of the table consists in a scale of credit marks, or units of value, based upon the percentages in the first part of the table. Thus, for the 89 Members of Congress studied, 1.8 per cent (column 5) of private bills introduced were enacted into law; 2.4 per cent of public bills introduced were enacted into law (column 5). The private bills were the most difficult to have enacted into law. If for every private bill enacted into law we allow 100 marks or units of value, then we must allow 77 marks for every public bill enacted into law. For, if 1.8 per cent for a private bill is given 100 marks, 2.4 per cent for a public bill will receive 77 marks—that is, 1.8 divided into 2.4 per cent is 1.3, and this divided into 100 equals 76.9, or 77.1. Again, 4.5 per cent of public bills passed the House (column 3); this divided by 1.8 equals 2.5, which divided into 100 equals 40 credit marks or units of value (column 9). So 48.9 per cent of amendments introduced were adopted; this divided by 1.8 equals 27.1, which divided into 100 gives 3.69, which we will call 4, meaning 4 credit marks. (In all cases where the decimal is 6 or more we give it the next number, so as to avoid fractions.)

All these results are not arbitrary, but are based upon the degree of difficulty of the different stages of legislation through which it passes until enacted into law.

INITIAL LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITY

There are Members of Congress who may not succeed in getting but few or no bills passed or amendments and resolutions adopted, but who are quite earnest in what may be called initial legislative activity; they may introduce many bills, and propose amendments to improve bills, trusting to get something done that may assist in legislation. Others make a point of watching legislation and frequently opposing it, if not blocking it, because they believed it is not for the public good. There are still others who feel it their duty to speak frequently on the floor so that the whole country may know the objections to and defects in whatever comes before Congress. There are also a very few who appear not only not to do anything, but not even to make any effort; they may feel discouraged or disgruntled or have concluded that they do not like the work at all and are not adapted to it; these, of course, would stand low in any estimate of legislative success or ability. Some have gone to such an extreme as to introduce bills to abolish either House or Congress itself.

It would seem that initial legislative activity should have some consideration in estimating legislative ability. The author consulted, as to his method with many who have had extensive experience in accounting for and recording initial legislative activities in both Houses. The following table (Table 2) gives the results:

TABLE 2.—Initial legislative activities

	Units of value
Petitions and memorials presented	¼
Private bills (including pension bills) introduced	½
Public bills and joint resolutions submitted	1
Motions and resolutions submitted	1
Number of subjects discussed on floor	1
Frequency of remarks on floor	1
Amendments submitted in advance or offered on floor	2
Reports for committees made by Member	5
Appointments and designations	10

In Table 2 are given the names of the various initial legislative activities in the order of their estimated value. It will be noted that four types of activity have the same credit mark or unit of value, because in such an estimate, fine distinctions should not be made, as the main purpose is a general approximate workable schedule.

Examining Table 2 in detail it will be noted that the introduction of a public bill, or joint resolution, or submission of simple resolution or motion, each count one unit of value or credit; likewise the number of subjects discussed on the floor, each count one; also the frequency of remarks on floor—that is, the number of different times remarks or speeches (without regard to length of time occupied) are made on the floor, each time counts one. As the Member speaking on different subjects is necessarily doing it publicly and submits himself to criticism, one unit at least should be allowed, the idea being to put the credits as low as feasible for initial legislative activity. Thus, one-fourth of a unit is given for every petition and memorial, and one-half of a unit for every private or pension bill introduced.

Amendments submitted in advance, or offered on the floor, are each counted two units, due to the fact that, in general, they probably require more legislative tact (ability) than mere introduction of public bills or resolutions.

Five units are allowed for each report by a Member from a committee. Some reports deserve much more; but, considering various reports as a whole, it was thought that five units would be about fair. For appointments and designations 10 units for each are allowed. An appointment to be a conferee on a large and important bill is a high legislative honor and usually, if not always, means a thorough knowledge of the bill, due to much experience and study of it in committee on the part of the Member appointed. Such an appointment deserves more than 10 units. Appointments, as chairmenships of special committees, to study some important matter, and report on it, or to make investigations of some irregularities, or public scandal, deserve more than 10 units. But there are other appointments, more or less formal, as attendance at funerals of Members, which deserve but one unit, if they do that. Also designations which are practically appointments vary much. So, on a general consideration of all kinds of appointments and designations it was thought that about 10 units for each one would be fair.

Distinctions might be made between different kinds of appointments and different credits given, but it would in many cases be too fine and too arbitrary. One thing may be said in regard to credits for appointments and designations, that certain leaders of experience who receive most of the appointments do not, as a rule, introduce many bills or resolutions, or get many through, because their time is taken up mostly in important committee work, for which they get little or no credit; but the 10 credits for each appointment act as an offset to make up for the lack of credits for high-class committee work, for which they receive no credit marks, and which could not be given them as work in committees is often more or less confidential.

Another question might arise as to difference between House and Senate, because Senators have more opportunities for legislative activities than Representatives, being much fewer in number, and passing upon all legislation coming from the House. But there are nearly three times as many bills, resolutions, and amendments introduced in the House than in the Senate (69th Cong.: 18,312 in House, 6,417 in Senate), for which credit is given in the House not only for the introduction, but for every further legislative advance of the bills, many of which never reach the Senate, affording no possibility of Senators receiving credit from them. Moreover, the House makes many more committee reports than the Senate (69th Cong.: House, 2,161; Senate, 1,717), for each of which five credits are allowed. But, nevertheless, admitting that Senators have more opportunities for credit marks, it must be remembered that usually it is much more difficult to become a Senator than a Representative, for the gaining of a senatorship is based not only on high standing at home and political acumen (ability), but often on previous successful and extensive experience either in the House of Representatives or in the State legislature. Since the chairmanship of a committee (as we have seen) affords special opportunities for legislative activity, giving credits, so being a Senator likewise furnishes special legislative advantages.

There is a further question as to advantages to a Member in receiving credits who belongs to the majority party in control of Congress. There is no doubt that this affords many advantages in gaining successful legislation and possibly more opportunity for legislative activity. But such advantages are more or less counterbalanced by the fact that minority Members, not being responsible for legislation, can attack it at every opportunity by making motions and amendments and frequent remarks, for all of which activities they receive credits, and frequently such opposition may show much legislative acumen or ability.

Moreover, some majority Members, who disagree with their leaders on some measure, refrain from making similar attacks on account of loyalty to their party, and lose such opportunities, while the minority Members may be encouraged by their own party to make such attacks, not to mention the fact that such activity whether merely partisan or not, often furnishes good material for home consumption, making the Member more popular in his district or State. In brief, Members by virtue of being of the minority party, are more encouraged to increase their legislative activity, especially the initial type, for which credits are given. But, notwithstanding such advantages, if it be admitted that the minority Members are still at a disadvantage, they could be allowed a certain percentage of increase in their credits in general, which might vary a little, according to special conditions in the Congress or session of the same Congress. Such percentage for increase of credits could be easily determined with approximate fairness to all. Moreover, the fact of one Member having 5 or 10 more credits than another would signify little or nothing, but when the difference gets to be larger it begins to have some significance, which increases as the difference increases. It might be added that in the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress, studied by the author, 5 Democratic Senators were among the first 20 Senators. Also in this study Table 7 shows seven Democratic Senators to stand higher than the Republican Senators (in majority party).

We have endeavored to give all the main difficulties or objections that might be urged against estimating legislative success or ability. After all has been said, it will be found that on the whole, for every disadvantage in one respect there is most always a counterbalancing advantage in another respect, for which we have tried to provide our schedule for unit values or credits. In short, as frequently indicated, the main purpose of the schedule is to give a rough but approximate estimate of legislative ability, which we deem feasible from our experience in a study of the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress, and we feel that many objections to estimating legislative ability are not based upon any serious study of the subject, but upon special and exceptional experiences, if not a general prejudice against any estimate whatever. When psychology began to measure thought and feeling, it encountered many similar objections that might be raised against estimating legislative ability. But objections of this nature will disappear, as they did in psychology. (With another American, the author measured in thousandths of a second, how long it takes to think, feel, or make a judgment. This was one of the first efforts of its kind, and was made 40 years ago in Wundt's laboratory at Leipsic.)

If anyone will examine Table 4 of article in Medical Times for November, 1928, where each of the 89 Members studied is ranked according to the number of his credit marks, beginning with the lowest, 14, and so on in order up to the highest, 2,412, he will realize the impossibility of knowing whom any one of these numbers represents. In fact, the author could not tell, unless he referred to the originals, which he has laid away to keep, in case any Member studied desired to know his own record, which, of course, would be given him.

Now, to illustrate the actual estimation of legislative success or ability, let us take the case of one Member, as shown in Table 3, where all the items (from 1 to 37) are given that can be marked for credits. Thus, beginning at the top of Table 3, this Member introduced 83 public bills and joint resolutions; now, looking at Table 2, giving the schedule for initial legislative activities, we find 1 unit of value or credit given for each bill or joint resolution introduced, which makes 83 units of value; there were 22 amendments offered by this Member; looking at Table 2, again, we find 2 units allowed for each amendment, making 44, and so on through the first part of Table 3. Now, passing on to the second part of the table for results of legislative activities, we note that of the public bills and joint resolutions introduced by this Member, three never went further than to be reported; looking at the schedule in Table 1 for results of legislative activities, we find (column 7) 32 credits for public bills reported, making 96 units, and so on, until we reach the end of the table, where the total is given of 2,403 units. Thus, by referring to Tables 1 and 2, we find a number of credits allowed for any item in Table 3.

If we had all Members of Congress, we could compare State delegations with each other (always relative, of course, to the number in each delegation); also groups of Members from the South, North, East, or West; also according to length of service or continuous service, and all such groups both with and without regard to political party. This might tend to encourage a healthy rivalry between States in legislative work, if not more carefulness in such work.

As already indicated, this whole study, with its results, can serve only as an illustration of initial research work in what may be called legislative anthropology. It is therefore hoped that similar studies of other legislative bodies may be undertaken, not only in our State legislatures but in the parliaments of other countries, so that eventually we may have a foundation for the development of a comparative legislative anthropology, with the United States in the lead.

As all legislative bodies are usually competitive in their activities, success is necessarily connected with merit. Also most legislative activities are not arbitrary, but all have certain causes and follow a law yet unknown, which may in the future be discovered, and lead to changes in rules of legislative procedure.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

Legislative anthropology is an effort to make a study of those persons who are politically successful; many of them are statesmen. It is all the more necessary, for this class of citizens are often underrated and unjustly so. Take, for example, Congress, where thirty-five or more thousand bills are introduced every Congress; from one to two thousand of these bills are enacted into law; that leaves some thirty-three thousand that fail. On the average, about 100 persons are interested in each bill; this means several millions of dissatisfied or disgruntled citizens for every Congress, and this has been going on for many years. Such dissatisfaction is cumulative, making persons anticongressional. In addition to all this, the faults and mistakes of members of a legislature are published (usually exaggerated) as often as they come up for election. If the lawyer's errors, the doctor's mistakes, and the preacher's faults were published from time to time, how would these gentlemen compare with members of a legislature or parliament?

THE UNITED STATES SENATE OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS

INTRODUCTION

There are three general ways of studying man—first, as an individual; second, as many individuals; and, third, as an organization.

The scientific study of man as an individual is comparatively recent;[1] the method is intensive. The study of man as many individuals, has been undertaken mainly in anthropology.[2] Investigations of this nature have been made upon large numbers of school children and also upon soldiers,[3] especially in examination of recruits in military service.[4] The study of man as an organization is sometimes undertaken from a psychological point of view, but very little scientific study of modern civilized man as an organization has been done. This, however, is not true in the case of animals; thus, in any encyclopedia you can find out much exact information as to the workings and results of beehives and anthills. One reason why we have relatively so much more definite knowledge about animals than man is because animals have been studied by much more scientific methods. Modern psychology, however, is presenting more definite results and more rational ways of investigating man.

The tacit assumption in this whole study is that all organizations of men, especially those of long standing and still more particularly those that result from competitive methods, are not haphazard, but act according to laws, most all of which are yet unknown. So the acts of the Senate as a whole are not accidental, but also work according to laws yet unknown. These, like all other laws, will be discovered not only through extensive, but more especially by scientific intensive study. Leading historians assume that the movements of history, including that of each nation, go by as yet unknown laws. If this be true, this power of law naturally controls all subordinate organizations, until it finally reaches the individual, who is the unit of the social organism. The scientific study of the individual shows that the effects upon him of both heredity and environment are also based upon laws of which we know very little.

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES—THE TRAITS OF HUMAN NATURE THAT GUIDE ITS SENATORS

There is no more important organization of man in America than the United States Senate. This, with the additional fact that all its proceedings are carefully recorded, is one of the main reasons we have made this organization an object of study. It would be almost impossible for one person to make an intensive study of a large number of Senates of different Congresses, owing to the large amount of computations required. So the Senate of three sessions of the Sixty-second Congress was selected. It is, perhaps, as normal a Senate as any; and while the results here obtained only refer to the Sixty-second Senate, nevertheless they may suggest ideas applicable to other Congresses. As a rule, the value of such studies and the probable truth of the conclusions would be proportionate to the number of Congresses studied. As in the case of all scientific study, names of persons and personalities are not necessary in the present inquiry.

QUORUM AND YEA-AND-NAY CALLS IN GENERAL

Before considering the attendance of divisions of Senators, or of individual Senators, on quorum and yea-and-nay calls, we may observe the general attendance of the Senate as a whole, as indicated in Table 1. In the first two lines of Table 1 are given the number of quorum and yea-and-nay calls for each session, and in the next two lines the total number of answers at all the quorum and yea-and-nay calls at such session.

If we multiply the number of Senators[5] (80) by the number of quorum calls for the first session, for instance, which is 70, we obtain 5,600, which represents 100 per cent of attendance, as the actual attendance on quorum calls in the first session was 3,705; this divided by 5,600 gives 66, the percentage of attendance of the Senate as a whole on quorum calls for the first session. The percentage for the other sessions, and for the yea-and-nay calls, are found in a similar manner.

Observing the last two lines of Table 1, it will be seen that the per cent of attendance both on quorum and yea-and-nay calls in the first session is considerably higher than in the other sessions, the lowest figures being in the second session. That is to say, the Senators attend quorum calls 10 per cent better in the first session than in the second session, and 4 per cent better in the third session than in the second session. Their attendance on yea-and-nay calls is 13 per cent more in the first session than in the second and 10 per cent more than in the third. Why, then, the relatively high per cent of attendance on quorum and yea-and-nay calls in the first session? We are unable to say. It might be due to the fact, that in the first sessions legislation has not as yet taken sufficiently definite form, so that some Senators attend that otherwise might not, had they known more about the matters in question, and to what extent they were interested as would be more the case in the second and long session when they might choose not to be present, because of other more pressing matters, at the time, or in which they were more interested. The higher percentage of attendance in the third session than in the second session may be due to the fact that the last session is crowded with much important legislation, and also that Senators are more on the lookout for the passage of their bills, as it may be their last chance. But as said, we are not certain as to the causes of these general changes in quorum and yea-and-nay calls. Had we the statistics of several, or of a large number of Congresses with which to make comparisons, it might be possible to determine definitely the causes.

It will be noted also that the (see last line last column of table) attendance of Senators on yea-and-nay calls is 10 per cent higher than on quorum calls. This refutes the idea that Senators desire to avoid recording their vote, but at the same time appear to be present. Yet eight (10 per cent) Senators (Table 5) shows a higher relative attendance at quorum than at yea-and-nay votings.

TABLE 1.—Quorum and yea-and-nay calls

Senate	First session	Second session	Third session	All 3 sessions

Per cent of attendance at yea-and-nay calls	78	65	6	69

QUORUM AND YEA-AND-NAY CALLS AND POLITICAL DIVISIONS

The per cent of attendance of political divisions of the Senate on quorum and yea-and-nay calls for each session and for all sessions is given in Table 2. These percentages are worked out as has been indicated in Table 1.

The Democratic and Republican Senators, the conservative and progressive Republicans, each and all have a higher percentage of attendance at yea-and-nay calls than at quorum calls. The Senate as a whole is 10 per cent higher in its attendance on yea-and-nay calls than in quorum calls, as already indicated.

Republican Senators show a higher percentage of attendance on both quorum and yea-and-nay calls for each session than Democratic Senators, and for all three sessions they are 7 per cent higher on quorum calls and 11 per cent higher on yea-and-nay calls than the Democrats. That the majority party attends better is to be expected, but how much less per cent the minority would be expected to have would depend upon a comparison with other Congresses.

TABLE 2

Sessions	Number	Per cent of attendance
		First	Second	Third	All
Quorum calls:
Senate	80	66	56	60	59
Democrats	34	60	53	54	55
Republicans	46	71	58	65	62
Conservative Republicans	34	70	59	64	63
Progressive Republicans	12	72	54	66	61
Yea-and-nay calls:
Senate	80	78	65	68	69
Democrats	34	77	63	63	66
Republicans	46	78	67	72	77
Conservative Republicans	34	78	66	68	70
Progressive Republicans	12	78	70	80	75

Comparing the progressive Republicans with the conservative Republicans as to quorum calls, the progressives show higher percentages for the first and third sessions, but for all three sessions the conservative Republicans lead. As to yea-and-nay calls, the progressive Republicans are distinctly higher for each session except the first, and for all three sessions have a percentage of 75 over against 70 per cent for the conservative Republicans.

Why the progressive Republicans should have a lower percentage for quorum calls and a higher percentage for yea-and-nay calls than the conservative Republicans is not clear. It will be noted that the progressives' lead for yea-and-nay votings is 5 per cent, while the conservatives lead in quorum calls by only 2 per cent. Here again the study of the Senate proceedings of many Congresses would make clear whether progressive movements show similar results from general laws or are simply tentative, due to special conditions at the time.

Table 3 gives the per cent of attendance at all sessions combined, of Senators who were engaged in some business before entering the Senate, Senators whose occupation was professional, and also Senators who are chairmen of important committees. The second part of the table is a repetition of a part of Table 2.

It will be noted that Senators who were business men have a higher per cent (61) of attendance at quorum calls, but a lower per cent (66) of attendance at yea-and-nay calls than Senators who had professional occupations, whose percentages are respectively 58 for quorum calls and 69 for yea-and-nay calls. If this should be true of the Senates of many Congresses, the explanation might be that business men are more regular in their work than professional men, and attendance at quorums is more a test of regularity than attendance at yea-and-nay voting.

As to chairmen of important committees, it will be seen from the table that they show the highest per cent (66) of all for attendance at quorum calls, but have a comparatively low per cent (69) of attendance at yea-and-nay calls as compared with the remaining Republicans, whose per cent is 77. It is to be remembered that the chairmen of important committees in this Congress were all Republicans.

DISPOSITION ON BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS OF THE SENATE OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS

Table 4 gives a summary of the different kinds of bills and their general history showing both number and per cent introduced, reported, passed Senate and enacted into law, and those not acted upon during three sessions of the Sixty-second Senate.

More than half (53 per cent) of the bills introduced are pension bills, about one-fifth (21 per cent) public bills, and a few less (18 per cent) private bills.

About five-sixths (87 per cent) of the private bills are not acted upon at all; also, about two-thirds (64 per cent) of the public bills and one-half of the pension bills are not acted upon.

Only 2½ per cent of private bills and 10 per cent of public bills are enacted into law, but 44 per cent of pension bills become law. In general, more than half (58 per cent) of all the bills and joint resolutions fail of passage.

That is, summing up this table in a general way, private bills are the most difficult to have enacted into law, public bills come next, then joint resolutions, then pension bills, then concurrent resolutions, and finally, the least difficult of all, Senate resolutions.

GENERAL TESTS OF SENATORIAL ACTIVITIES

Table 5 may be regarded as the basis for general tests of senatorial activities. In column 1 the Senators are numbered from 1 to 80, according to their rank in success with public legislation. The rank of each Senator in column 1 is based upon the figures in column 28, which in turn depend upon the scale for legislative ability in Table 2. The figures in columns 2 to 9, inclusive, refer to what may be called initial activity, showing the degree of willingness of the part of each Senator to undertake legislative work. One indication of this is the number of public bills and joint resolutions introduced by each Senator (column 2). Another sign is the number of private and pension bills introduced (columns 3 and 4), then come number of amendments offered (column 5), motions and resolutions submitted (column 6), and petitions and memorials presented (column 7). Initial legislative activity is not only indicated by the introduction of bills, or offering of amendments or submitting of motions, but by the number of subjects discussed and frequency (not length) of remarks on the floor of the Senate as shown for each Senator in columns 8 and 9 of Table 5.

In columns 10 to 24, inclusive, are presented the results of various legislative activities, showing, for each Senator, the number of reports made in general for committees (column 10), and in particular on public bills (column 11) and private bills (column 19).

In column 12 are the number of public bills introduced by each Senator, which only passed the Senate but went no farther. Column 13 gives for each Senator the number of public bills introduced by him, which not only passed the Senate but the House also, and were enacted into law. Columns 14 and 15 show figures for joint resolutions introduced by each Senator which either passed the Senate only or were enacted into law. The number of concurrent resolutions introduced which were agreed upon by the Senate but not by the House will be found in column 16; those which succeeded still further, and were passed by both House and Senate, appear in column 17. In column 18 are the number of simple Senate resolutions introduced which were adopted by the Senate. In columns 19 to 23, inclusive, are the figures for each Senator, showing the results or degrees of success in his private legislative activities; that is to say, for instance, the number of private bills which he introduced which were reported only but did not progress further (column 19), or passed the Senate only after being reported (column 20), or as indicated in column 21, succeeded still better and were enacted into law.

In columns 22 and 23 will be found the number of pension bills introduced which passed the Senate only, or those which succeeded better and were enacted into law. Column 24 indicates number of appointments and designations bestowed upon Senators, which practically are honors, such as appointments upon committees to wait upon the President or to represent the Senate or their party in any capacity.

The faithfulness of Senators in their attendance on quorum and yea-and-nay calls, or both combined, are indicated by percentages in columns 25, 26, and 27. Columns 28, 29, and 30 show the rank of each Senator for success in public and private legislative activity and both together.

FREQUENCY OF REMARKS IN THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

In the first part of Table 6 are given the number of pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on which remarks occur of Democratic, Republican, progressive Republican, and conservative Republican Senators, with their averages. All figures in this table are based upon those in column 9, Table 5. The highest average, 242 (Table 6), is that the progressive Republicans, which may illustrate the general truth that those who are the most aggressive for reform or change of methods or of conditions must talk the most frequently; thus the average frequency of remarks for the conservative Republicans is only 167 as compared with 242 of the progressive Republicans.

Next to the lowest average for frequency of remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is that of the Democrats, who were the minority party. But the minority does not consider itself responsible for legislation, and has less interest in it and generally less need to talk.

THE BEST EDUCATED SPEAK THE MOST FREQUENTLY IN THE SENATE

In the second half of Table 6 the Senators are classified according to their educational opportunities, as those with (1) university, (2) collegiate, and (3) common-school education. Those best educated talk most frequently, showing an average of 233, and those with only a common-school education showing the lowest average, 139. In general, the frequency of remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD varies according to the degree of education. The fact that professional men average (180) much higher than business men, whose average is 113 (the lowest of all), confirms this statement. Business men talk the least, probably for two reasons; first, they are not as well educated as other Senators, and second, the habits of business life tend to action rather than talk.

The chairman of an important committee, whose average is 215, stands third for frequency of remarks, due probably to the necessity of speaking often and answering questions when in charge of the commitee bills on floor of the Senate.

PREVIOUS LIFE OF SENATORS

Table 7 presents a summary of details as to lives of Senators before entering the Senate, as given by the Senators themselves in the Congressional Directories for the Sixty-second Congress.

Beginning with the first line of the table, we note that more than half of the Senators (67 per cent) were reared in the country, 33 per cent being reared in the city. As to education, the largest number (47 per cent) had received a collegiate training, 28 per cent had only been in the common school, and 25 per cent had university training. Under the head of "Occupation," it will be seen that the great majority (71 per cent) were lawyers. Distinguishing between business and professional life, 21 per cent belonged to the former and 79 per cent to the latter.

[2] Delegate to national convention, etc. Some honors given while in Senate.

A distinct majority (64 per cent) had legislative experience before entering the Senate, and as many as 32 per cent had served in the House of Representatives, which, as we shall see later, is a valuable preparation for the Senate. Fifteen per cent had suffered previous serious political defeats. Some of the best Senators were among this number.

A good majority of Senators (60 per cent) had experience in public office. The 42 per cent of Senators receiving political honors as delegates to the national convention are usually strong party men. As seen from the table under the head on "Executive service," a relatively large number of Senators (28 per cent) have been governors of their States before entering the Senate, furnishing the Senator with a practical knowledge of the wants of his State. It would be interesting to know if such Senators held their seats in the Senate longest. This step from governor to Senator is a frequent one. Another good practical preparation for the Senate (also frequent) is experience as district attorney, then membership in the House of Representatives, and finally coming to the Senate. This is indicated from the fact, as seen from the table, that 21 per cent of the Senators have been district attorneys and 32 per cent Members of the House of Representatives.

DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS COMPARED

It may not be without interest to make a few comparisons of a psychological and educational nature between the Democratic and Republican Senators, as shown in Table 8.

TABLE 8

	Number	Per cent
Democrats born in the city	9	26
Democrats born in the country	25	74
Republicans born in the city	17	37
Republicans born in the country	29	63

Democrats who have college training	13	38
Democrats who have common-school training	9	27
Republicans with university training	8	17
Republicans with college training	25	54
Republicans with common-school training	13	29

Of the Democratic Senators, 74 per cent were reared in the country, as over against 63 per cent of Republicans; 86 per cent of Democrats are professional men and 14 per cent business men, while 74 per cent of the Republicans are professional men and 26 per cent business men; that is about 10 per cent more Democrats than Republicans were reared in the country, and also about 10 per cent more Democrats than Republicans are professional men. While the Democrats greatly excel the Republicans in university training (35 per cent over against 17 per cent) the Republicans excel the Democrats in college training (54 per cent over against 38 per cent).

ESTIMATE OF LEGISLATIVE SUCCESS

As seen from Table 9, the last part of which is taken from Table 4, private bills were the most difficult to have acted upon in this Congress. Whether this be true generally could only be determined by a study of many Congresses. Only 2½ per cent of private bills were enacted into law. If we take the private bills as a criterion and let 2½ per cent equal 100 units of value, then dividing 2½ by the different per cents for the different classes of bills, we will have a scale of evaluation based upon the actual results obtained, that is a scale which is not arbitrary. This scale is presented in Table 9.

TABLE 9.—Percentages and scale of units

	Per cent reported	Per cent passed Senate	Per cent became law	Scale for
				Reported	Passed Senate	Enactment into law
Private bills	12	10	2½	20	25	100
Public bills	35	30	10	7	8	25
Joint resolutions		42	24		6	10
Pension bills		50	44		5	6
Concurrent resolutions		67	56		3	4
Senate resolutions		74			2

Thus, if every private bill passed counts 100; as 10 per cent of public bills were enacted into law, then every public bill enacted into law will count 25; as 24 per cent of joint resolutions passed, each joint resolution passed will count 10. That is, the more difficult it is to have action taken on any class of bills, the more that action counts in the scale.

Let us now, as an example, work out the standing of Senator No. 1, the highest of all as recorded in Table 5. Beginning with column 12 we note that Senator No. 1 was successful in having 23 public bills, introduced by him, reported out of committee only; if we revert to the scale of values in the second part of Table 9, we find that each public bill reported out only, counts 7, making 23 bills reported out, 161 units of value, based upon our standard of 100 units of value for every private bill enacted into law, as already explained.

Column 12 of Table 5 shows that 44 of the public bills introduced by Senator No. 1 passed the Senate only. Reverting to the scale in Table 9, we find that each public bill which passes the Senate ccunts 8, making for 44 bills, 352. Column 13 of Table 5 gives 14 public bills of Senator No. 1 enacted into law; reverting to the scale of Table 9, we find that each public bill enacted into law counts 25, so that 14 bills would make 350. Column 14 gives two joint resolutions as passing Senate only; according to the scale, each joint resolution passing Senate only, counts 6, making 12. Column 15 shows four joint resolutions were enacted into law; according to the scale each joint resolution enacted into law counts 10, making 40. Column 16 gives one concurrent resolution agreed to in Senate only which, according to the scale, makes 3. Column 18 gives 25 Senate resolutions agreed to which, according to scale (each counting 3), makes 75. Adding all these results as follows—

Public bills reported out, 23×7	161
Public bills passed Senate only, 44×8	352
Public bills enacted into law, 14×24	350
Joint resolutions passed Senate only, 2×6	12
Joint resolutions enacted into law, 4×10	40
Concurrent resolutions passed Senate, 1×3	3
Senate resolution agreed to, 25×3	75
	993

We have a total number of units of value for the public legislative results or success of Senator No. 1, which is 993. The results for each Senator have been worked out in a similar way for success in private legislative activity (column 29, Table 5), and for both public and private combined (column 30, Table 5).

DIFFICULT TO ESTIMATE A SENATOR'S STANDING

The difficulties of estimating the standing of a Senator for legislative success by any scale are evident at once and naturally produce skepticism. However, the attempt here is at best intended to be only approximate; that is, the difference of a few units between Senators would have little or no significance, but if it were a larger number it would have a certain weight. If, from a study of several Congresses, a Senator were shown to have relatively a similar standing, this would strengthen the value of the estimate.

TABLE 10

Political divisions	Number	Number of units for public legislative success	Average
Democrats	34	2,603	76
Republicans	46	7,215	156
Progressive Republicans	12	1,514	126
Conservative Republicans	34	5,701	167
Democrats, 2,603 plus 50 per cent (1,301)	34	3,904	114

Table 10 gives an estimate of the political divisions of Senators as to their success in public legislative activity. This estimate is made according to the scale given in the second part of Table 9. In the third column of Table 10 are given the total number of units of success for each of the political divisions; this total divided by the number of Senators in each political division gives the averages. As will be noted, the Democrats, who were the minority party in this Congress, average 76, being nearly 50 per cent less than 150 which is the average for the Republicans.

There are obvious reasons for this great difference in successful public legislative activity between the Democrats, or minority party, and the Republicans, or majority party. The majority party have all the important chairmanships; the majority party are held responsible for the legislative program and naturally desire to have charge of the bills, especially those which seem to have some chance of passing. This goes so far sometimes that if a minority member has worked out and introduced such a bill, a majority member will introduce practically the same bill. For it is not considered good politics to have popular bills passed which bear the names of minority members. Such cases, however, are very infrequent and are only mentioned to illustrate how jealous the majority party are of their control of legislation.

Since for these and other reasons connected with the prestige of the majority party, the minority are at great disadvantage, and since they average 50 per cent less (76) than the majority (156) in successful public legislative activity, and assuming this to be an average or normal Congress, it would seem just, in order to effect such disadvantages, to allow the minority 50 per cent increase. In all further estimates of public legislative success, therefore, we will add to the standing of each Democrat 50 per cent of his units of value. These units of value are given in Table 5, column 28. Thus, Senator No. 12, for instance, has 188 units of value; adding 50 per cent of 188 to 188 makes 282 as his standing for success in public legislative activity.

Division of Senators	Number	Average units for public legislative success
Business men	17	106
Professional men	63	144
Chairmen of important committees	13	208
Remaining Republicans	33	138
Senators reared in the city	26	130
Senators reared in the country	54	143

Table 11 gives the standing for success in public legislative activity of Senators who were business men, professional men, chairmen of important committees (all Republicans), and remaining Republicans; also the degree of success of Senators reared in the city as compared with those reared in the country.

From the last column of the table, it will be seen that professional men as Senators are more successful in their public legislative activity than Senators who were business men, showing an average of 144 over against 106. This is to be expected as professional men, especially lawyers, are better equipped. The average of 208 for chairmen of important committees is very high as compared with that of the remaining Republicans, which is 138. This may be partially due to the fact that the chairmen sometimes introduce public bills for the committee, rather than for themselves. Still, the fact of being a chairman of an important committee is a credit.

PREVIOUS SERVICE IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Taking all the Senators who have served in the House of Representatives and considering their average for successful public legislative activity, we find it to be 177. This suggests the beneficial influence upon Senators of having had service in the House of Representatives previous to entering the Senate. For if we consider in contrast with this the average 119, which is that of Senators without previous legislative experience of any kind, the significance of the high average of 177 is evident.

Working out in a similar manner the average for Senators who have received political honors as delegates to a national political convention, we find their average to be 148, which is relatively high. As these Senators are usually strong party men, there is no indication that their interest in politics, as such, affects their faithfulness to their work in the Senate.

EDUCATION AND LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITY

Table 12 gives the average standing for success in public legislative activity of Senators with university education (124) as compared with Senators having merely a common-school training. It will be seen that the degree of success in both public and private legislation varies inversely with education, that is, the better educated the Senator, the less his success in legislative activity.

TABLE 12

Senators divided according to educational qualifications	Number	Per cent	Average units of value for results of legislative activity
			Public	Private	Both
Senators with university education	20	25	124	142	266
Senators with college education	38	47	130	286	416
Senators with common school	22	28	184	286	470

This does not mean, of course, that education necessarily has anything to do with this result as a cause. There are many other things in the character of the men themselves that might act as causes. It may be said, however, that education sometimes tends to make men more reserved in their opinions and so less aggressive and intense in action.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO THE SENATE OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS

While the following conclusions apply only to the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress, they nevertheless create a presumption in favor of their application to other Congresses. If, upon investigation of the Senate of a large number of Congresses, these conclusions prove applicable with some modifications that might be expected, their general truth might be established. But at present they can only be held as tentative.

A further advantage in the study of many Senates would be that other and subclassifications of Senators would be made possible on account of larger numbers, furnishing a statistical basis for additional analysis. Such study might not only cause some rules of Congress to be changed, but also serve as a basis for better legislation.

1. The Senate of the Sixty-second Congress may be called a normal Senate, like many others.
2. Senators attend quorum and yea-and-nay calls better in the first and third sessions than in the second session of Congress.
3. The Senate, as a whole, is 10 per cent higher in its attendance on yea-and-nay calls than on quorum calls, refuting the idea that Senators as a class avoid voting.
4. Progressive Republicans show a higher per cent of attendance on yea-and-nay calls, but a lower per cent on quorum calls, than conservative Republicans.
5. Senators who are business men attend quorum calls more, but yea-and-nay calls less, than Senators who are professional men.
6. Chairmen of important committees have the highest per cent of all for attendance at quorum calls.
7. Private bills are the most difficult to enact into law (2½ per cent), public bills come next (10 per cent), then in their descending order come pension bills, concurrent resolutions, and finally Senate resolutions, which are the least difficult. But—
8. In general, more than half of the legislation initiated in the Senate receives little or no attention.
9. As to frequency of remarks on the floor of the Senate the progressive Republicans have the highest average.
10. The frequency of remarks on the floor of the Senate varies according to degree of education. This is confirmed by the fact that,
11. Professional men average much higher than business men in their frequency of remarks on the Senate floor.
12. The great majority of Senators (79 per cent) are professional men as distinguished from business men (21 per cent); and a large majority (67 per cent) were reared in the country.
13. While the Democrats excel the Republicans in university education, the Republicans excel the Democrats in college training.
14. Senators without previous legislative experience are less successful in legislation.
15. Senators who are strong party men do not allow their political interests to affect their faithfulness in senatorial duties.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 26, being Order of Business No. 617 on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 26) submitted by Mr. BROOKHART December 9, 1931, and from which the Committee on Rules was discharged April 21, 1932, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of paragraph 1 of Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate as reads "Committee on Pensions, to consist of 11 Senators" is amended to read as follows:

"Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of 13 Senators, to which shall be referred all legislation and other matters relating to pensions, Government life insurance, and death or disability compensation, hospitalization, and allowances of persons in the military or naval service of the United States and their beneficiaries, and all legislation and other matters relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and its branches."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am very strongly in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, but I think there are some bills on the calendar which should be considered and which probably will take no time, whereas the resolution of the Senator from Iowa will probably take considerable time.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think the resolution will take any time now, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I had intended this morning to make a request for unanimous consent with respect to the consideration of bills on the calendar and as to where we should commence. I shall suggest the matter to the Senator from Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate begin the consideration of the calendar with Order of Business No. 621, which is the order following that at which we stopped when the calendar was last under consideration. That will permit us to go through with the calendar.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will agree to that if it does not interfere with my motion. I have made a motion to take up Calendar No. 617. If we can begin with that order of business, I will agree to the request.

Mr. McNARY. I would not want to commence the consideration of the calendar to include a bill or resolution which went over when the calendar was last considered. I do not want to retrace our steps, but to go through the calendar to-day, beginning with the order of business following the one which was last considered.

Mr. BROOKHART. Order of Business No. 617, which was debated day before yesterday, was not concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand the motion is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But may I make a brief statement, as other Senators have done so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a number of Senators who are interested in this resolution did not know that it was to be called up this morning. In fairness to them, I think they should have an opportunity of being present, and I will therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BROOKHART. I gave notice to them that I would press this resolution at every opportunity. It has been here for two years; so I think we ought not to wait on account of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I feel that it is proper and fair that they be informed that the resolution is being taken up on motion at this time. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Oddie
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Patterson
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Blaine	Fletcher	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Bratton	Frazier	Keyes	Schall
Brookhart	George	King	Sheppard
Broussard	Glass	La Follette	Smoot
Bulkley	Glenn	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Byrnes	Gore	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Capper	Hale	McKellar	Townsend
Caraway	Harrison	McNary	Trammell
Cohen	Hawes	Moses	Vandenberg
Coolidge	Hayden	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hebert	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Costigan	Howell	Norris	Watson
Couzens	Hull	Nye

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I proceed for five minutes by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana requests unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I voted for the resolution of the Senator from Iowa in the Committee on Rules, and

I favor it; but I have knowledge of the fact that, if taken up, it would be debated until 2 o'clock and nothing would be accomplished. Therefore I wish to ask the Senator to wait until a different time to bring it up, until, say, 12 o'clock, because I am sure that nothing will be accomplished this morning in the way of the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be made the unfinished business immediately following the disposition of the pending farm bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the appropriation bills are coming on apace, one after another, as rapidly as they can be brought in from the committee, it appears to me that they ought to be proceeded with.

I will say to the Senator that I shall do anything in my power to help him secure consideration for his resolution at the proper time, and we shall have an abundance of time; we are not going to get away from here to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKHART. I went through to the end of the last session on some such assurances.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did not have such assurances from me.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; the Senator was strongly of the opinion that we could have the resolution considered.

Mr. WATSON. I was with the Senator in spirit, but I was not with him in action.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The press reports indicate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will assume that the debate may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. The Senator from Indiana secured consent to speak for five minutes, and the five minutes have not expired.

Mr. WATSON. This is part of the five minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement is attributed to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] that the Congress will adjourn next Saturday. I should like to have some further advice and information about that in view of the situation of the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am still hopeful that we shall conclude our work by next Saturday; I still cling to that grim hope; and if all of us were of the same opinion that I am, we would stay here until we did finish on next Saturday. But whether we shall do so or not I can not at this time prophesy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for just one further statement?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I must characterize my good friend the Senator from Oregon as an amazing optimist. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. At all events, Mr. President, whatever may be the desire and hope of my friend from Oregon, and whatever may be the outcome, I was going to say that I do not believe anything can be accomplished by debating the resolution of the Senator from Iowa at this time. I believe that two hours or an hour and a half will simply be wasted in discussion, when, if he will bide his time, we will endeavor to have the resolution brought up in order and let it take its chances in the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will ask unanimous consent, then, that at 12 o'clock the Senate proceed to vote on the resolution and any amendments thereto. I do not want to consume time unnecessarily.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that in any unanimous consent he may ask he should except the consideration of appropriation bills so as not to interfere with them.

Mr. BROOKHART. My last request was that a vote be taken at 12 o'clock, which would not interfere with anything.

Mr. JONES. I understand that, but that was objected to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to an immediate vote on any amendments and on the resolution itself without debate.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request.

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed immediately to vote on any amendments and on the resolution itself without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question, anyway.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. The pending question, I understand, is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate take up for consideration the resolution named by him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 617, being Senate Resolution 26.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should object to that. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is absent, and will not be able to be here for three-quarters of an hour. He desires to be present when the resolution is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Couzens	Jones	Patterson
Bankhead	Cutting	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Dale	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Blaine	Davis	Keyes	Schall
Bratton	Fletcher	King	Sheppard
Brookhart	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Broussard	George	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Gore	McKellar	Townsend

Cohen	Hayden	Neely	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hebert	Norbeck	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Norris	White
Copeland	Hull	Nye
Costigan	Johnson	Oddie

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 26. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division.

On a division, Mr. BROOKHART's motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I now renew my request that we commence with the calendar where we left off day before yesterday, with Order of Business No. 621.

INDIANS OF WASHINGTON, IDAHO, AND MONTANA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1523) for the relief of certain tribes or bands of Indians in the States of Washington, Idaho, and Montana, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, apparently there is an adverse report on this bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I may say that the department always makes adverse reports on any Court of Claims measure for the Indians. This is in accord with the usual bills to allow the Indians to go into the Court of Claims. It is just giving them their day in court. It takes several years to decide a case of this kind. I believe these Indians are entitled to it, and I should like to see the bill passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 10, after the words "in the," to strike out "State" and insert "States," and on page 2, line 1, after the word "Washington," to insert "and Idaho," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc.,

First. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to consider, determine, and render judgment on all legal and equitable claims against the United States of the Okanogan, Methow, San Poells or Sanpoeilles, Nespelem, Colville, and Lake Tribes or Bands of Indians residing in the State of Washington; and the lower, middle, and upper tribes or bands of Spokane Indians residing in the States of Washington and Idaho; and the Cowlitz Tribe or Band of Indians residing in the States of Washington and Idaho; and the Lower Pend O'Reille or Lower Kahlis-pell or Lower Calispell Tribe or Band of Indians residing in the States of Washington, Idaho, and Montana, for lands and hunting and fishing rights claimed to be existing in said tribes or bands of Indians by virtue of aboriginal occupancy and possession, and their alleged right to hunt in the common hunting ground created by article 3 of the treaty of October 17, 1855 (11 Stat. L. 657), between the United States and the Blackfeet and other Indian tribes, which said lands and hunting and fishing rights are alleged to have been taken from said tribes or bands of Indians by the United States without compensation therefor, and all claims of said lower, middle, and upper tribes or bands of Spokane Indians of the State of Washington arising out of the treaty of March 18, 1887, approved July 13, 1892 (27 Stat. L. 120), between said Indians and the United States, including the diversion or misapplication of moneys appropriated by Congress for the fulfillment of said treaty, and also any legal or equitable setoffs, or counterclaims, including gratuities, which the United States may have against the said tribes or bands, all claims and defenses to be considered without regard to lapse of time; the jurisdiction hereby conferred, except that relating to said common hunting ground, being limited to the location of the lands and hunting and fishing rights therein of said respective tribes or bands of Indians shown in Gov. I. I. Stevens's map of the Indian Nations and Tribes of the Territory of Washington, and of the Territory of Nebraska, compiled March, 1857, and now a part of the files of the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as map No. 187, and by the Fourteenth Annual Report, Bureau of American Ethnology, part 2, pages 731 to 734, and Map LXXXVIII at pages 716 and 717, and being also limited to any of said lands and hunting and fishing rights not heretofore relinquished by said tribes or bands of Indians by treaty or agreement with the United States.

Second. That suit under this act may be brought severally by said respective tribes or bands of Indians or may be joined in a single action, and shall be begun by the filing of a petition within five years from the date of the approval of this act, said petition to be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by the claimant Indians under contracts executed and approved in accordance with existing law. The claimant Indians shall be parties plaintiff and the United States shall be party defendant, and such suit or suits shall on motion of either party be advanced on the docket of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Third. The compensation to be paid the attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Court of Claims in accordance with the terms of said approved contracts and shall be paid out of any sum or sums found and adjudged to be due said Indians, but in no event shall said compensation exceed 10 per cent of the amount of any judgments rendered in favor of said Indians, said compensation to be exclusive of all actual and necessary expenses in prosecuting said suits, which said expenses shall be paid out of such judgments on accounts passed on and approved by the said Court of Claims. The balance of any such judgments shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians entitled thereto and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUALIFICATIONS OF PRACTITIONERS OF LAW IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 3223) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire what are the changes in existing law that this bill contemplates.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the present law is wholly inadequate, and my recollection is that there is no general statute dealing with this question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think this bill should receive consideration. It is manifestly intended to deny nonresident lawyers the opportunity to participate in litigation in the District of Columbia. The thought is suggested to me that the bill ought to be considered somewhat carefully. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HIGH-SCHOOL BUILDING, SHANNON COUNTY, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 2340) to provide funds for cooperation with the school board of Shannon County, S. Dak., in the construction of a consolidated high-school building to be available to both white and Indian children, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection.

Mr. KING. I will withhold it. I should like an explanation of the bill from the Senator.

Mr. NORBECK. This is really an effort to do something practical along the line of educating the Indians. I have maintained that 90 per cent of the money we have spent in educating them has been wasted. This is to get a school that will teach the vocational arts, and a place where the white people and the Indians will join in the school. It is located on a reservation that has a county unit system of schools where the county will cooperate with the Government and have a joint school. The department to which it has been referred speaks very highly of it. They did say that they thought the Government could not afford to pay out so much money at this time; but this is just an authorization. We are not asking for an appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much is authorized to be expended out of the appropriation?

Mr. NORBECK. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I think that measures of this kind ought to come from and through the Committee on Appropriations, who have in charge the Indian appropriation bill. I notice that the Indian Bureau is recommending appropriations oftentimes for the Indians outside of the general appropriation bills dealing with the Indians throughout the United States. Pretty soon we will have a large appropriation bill, as we have now, for the Indians, from twenty-five to thirty-four million dollars; and then, because the Bureau of Indian Affairs expend so much needlessly and wastefully and extravagantly in administration, they introduce or support measures calling for appropriations for the Indians independently of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. NORBECK. But the Senator will agree with me that the usual way of legislating on this matter has been through the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. NORBECK. That is where this bill comes from. I hope the Senator will not object. If, on the other hand, when the appropriation comes up, he feels that it is too big, there are plenty of chances to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the Public School Board of Shannon County, S. Dak., for the construction and equipment of a consolidated public high-school building at Pine Ridge, S. Dak.: Provided, That said school shall be conducted for both white and Indian children, without discrimination, and that practical training for vocations and home economics be provided, and that the cost of education of white children shall be defrayed by the State and local public-school authorities, in accordance with such agreement or agreements as may be made between the Secretary of the Interior and State or local officials, and any and all sums of money obtained by reason of such agreement or agreements shall be available for reexpenditure for support and maintenance of said school.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 60) to hear and determine the contest of George M. Pritchard against Josiah W. Bailey for a seat in the Senate from the State of North Carolina was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], I think the matter should go over.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is objecting to that course. A matter of this nature ought to be disposed of at some time.

Mr. McNARY. I ask, then, that it be temporarily passed over until his return to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be temporarily laid aside.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

The resolution (S. Res. 26) changing the name of the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and defining its jurisdiction, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KING. That is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, as I understand it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No unanimous-consent agreement was entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that no unanimous-consent agreement was entered into.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 26.

Mr. CUTTING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is absent from the city. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], which I transfer to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], and vote "nay."

I am not advised how any of these Senators would vote on this question.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and let my vote stand.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] are necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is absent on very important business. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and allow my vote to stand.

So Mr. BROOKHART's motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 26) changing the name of the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and defining its jurisdiction, which is as follows:

Resolved, That so much of paragraph 1 of Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate as reads "Committee on Pensions, to consist of 11 Senators" is amended to read as follows:

"Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of 13 Senators, to which shall be referred all legislation and other matters relating to pensions, Government life insurance, and death or disability compensation, hospitalization, and allowances of persons in the military or naval service of the United States and their beneficiaries, and all legislation and other matters relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and its branches."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has an amendment pending, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 3, after the word "amended," insert the words "effective at the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to have a vote on the amendment. I am opposed to it myself. As I understand it, the effect of the amendment is to postpone the going into effect of the change until next December.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I see no reason why it should not go into effect now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I take it that it will be quite impossible for any committee to consider veterans' legislation at this session, and I was wondering whether the actual effect of the change would not be deferred under any circumstances until December?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, that is precisely the theory upon which I submitted the amendment at the last session of the Senate which considered the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course nobody knows, I suppose, how long we are going to be here; but I know of no reason why the committee should not consider legislation at this session. I myself have two or three bills pending before the Finance Committee which I think ought to receive consideration and ought to be acted on at this session. I do not want to take the time of the Senate now to discuss it, because I realize, under the parliamentary situation, that nothing would better please those who are opposed to the resolution than for somebody to occupy the time until 12 o'clock, when, under the rule, the resolution would have to go over.

I do not understand why the new committee could not do some very effective work at the present session of Congress. If we stay here, as we probably will, for a couple of weeks longer, we could get some action of the Senate on some of the pending bills. For instance, there is a bill pending to change the rate of interest that must be charged the veterans. At the present time the Government is making a profit, charging 5 per cent interest. It seems to me that is an outrageous thing. There are several bills pending to lower the rate of interest. There is no reason why such bills should not be considered and enacted into law at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the amendment which is pending.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska and do not myself desire to interfere with a conclusive vote. Therefore I have taken no time upon the amendment. It was offered when the resolution was last before the Senate on the theory, first, that the committee will have to be reorganized, in view of the fact that its membership is being increased in number. Secondly, if we are to be here only a week or 10 days or 2 weeks longer, my theory is that the reorganization of the committee would deter action upon veterans' legislation rather than to facilitate it, inasmuch as the entire proceeding would have to start de novo. It is on that theory, and on the theory that it is the orderly thing to reorganize committees at the beginning of a session, that I submitted the amendment.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Michigan whether he understands, if the resolution shall be agreed to, that it supersedes the existing committee and creates a new committee, or whether it merely transfers the existing Pensions Committee to the status of the new committee under the resolution with the number to be augmented by appointment from both sides of the aisle.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Iowa answered that question a few days ago by a statement that the theory of the proceeding is the creation of a de novo committee, but obviously the natural thing would be to transfer the personnel of the Pensions Committee, as it now exists, as a nucleus of the new committee. Certainly I have no thought in offering the amendment to indicate any objection to that method of organization, because I would not for a moment reflect upon the personnel of the Pensions Committee.

Mr. KING. I am trying to ascertain whether automatically the Pensions Committee would function under the amended rule or would continue to function under the present rule.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I prefer to let the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the author of the resolution, explain it.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Iowa answer my inquiry.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the resolution entirely abolishes or discontinues the Pensions Committee and creates a new committee, which will be organized as a new committee. There is no automatic transfer of any membership from one to the other.

Mr. KING. Upon the adoption of the resolution, if it shall be adopted, would the present Pensions Committee cease to function, or would it await reorganization by the Senate, because, as the Senator knows, appointments to the various committees are made by the Senate, of course, upon the recommendation of the leaders of the respective parties.

Mr. BROOKHART. The present Pensions Committee, of course, would cease to function and the new committee would take over all the jurisdiction it has at the present time.

Mr. KING. Then for the moment, or for some little time, there would be two committees functioning, the committee created by the resolution and the old Pensions Committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I think not. I think the moment the Pensions Committee would cease to exist the new committee would come into being.

Mr. KING. Then the resolution would repeal the rule which has created or provided for the existing Pensions Committee?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; it changes that rule and makes a new rule entirely, creating a new committee entirely, and transfers the jurisdiction of all veterans' affairs to the new committee, whereas those affairs are now scattered around among three or four committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to the transfer of my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I understand that my general pair, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], if he were present, would vote as I expect to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

I am not advised how any of these Senators would vote on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. VANDENBERG'S amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, when the resolution was before the Senate a day or two ago, observing that many persons had an aversion to the cabalistic number 13, I offered an amendment to increase the membership of the committee to 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona renew his amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. I renew the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "13" and insert "15," so that it will read:

Committee on Veterans' Affairs to consist of 15 Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there has been considerable complaint that some of the committees are too large, that they do not function properly, and that it is difficult to get the quorum, does the Senator think it is wise to make the committee so large? I have no particular opinion one way or the other in this matter, but the Senator from Arizona knows there has been considerable criticism because of the large membership of many of the important committees of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am of the opinion in view of the vast importance of the proposed committee—and it is going to be a committee of transcendent importance—it should be composed of 15 members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. GORE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dale	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Davis	King	Schall
Barbour	Dill	La Follette	Sheppard
Blaine	Fletcher	Logan	Steiwer
Brookhart	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Idaho

Caraway	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg
Carey	Hawes	Norbeck	Wagner
Cohen	Hayden	Norris	Walcott
Connally	Hebert	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Howell	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Copeland	Hull	Patterson	Watson
Costigan	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Couzens	Jones	Reed	White
Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] are detained in the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa as amended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on Monday, at a time when not very many Senators were present, I called attention to a compilation made by the clerk of the Finance Committee showing the number of bills having to do with veterans' legislation upon which that committee had acted. The American Legion or some representative of it in Washington had prepared a statement which tended to show superficially that the Finance Committee had been singularly indolent in its handling of proposed veterans' legislation. That statement, as presented by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], purported to give the figures up to about the middle of May. At my request the clerk of the Committee on Finance prepared an accurate statement up to Monday of this week—and the circumstances have not changed since Monday—which statement shows that there have been referred to the Finance Committee general and special bills dealing with veterans' legislation to the number of 170. Of those, 99 have been referred to subcommittees and 34 have been acted upon by the Finance Committee as a whole without reference; that is to say, 133 bills have been acted upon by the Finance Committee out of the 170 which have been referred to that committee by the Senate. Of the 34 which were acted upon directly, all were special bills proposing the building of hospitals at particular localities in the United States. No town has been too humble to ask for the erection of a veterans' hospital on its outskirts, and 34 bills to that effect have been introduced.

At the last session of Congress we fought that matter out with the House of Representatives. They sent us a sort of pork-barrel veterans' hospital construction bill, directing the Veterans' Administration to build a certain number of hospitals in the particularly named towns, they assuming thereby to know more about the needs of the veterans than the hospitalization bureau of the Veterans' Administration. The Senate took a contrary position, and said that it was going to treat those cases exactly as it treats river and harbor projects; that it had had enough of the pork-barrel method of building veterans' hospitals. So the Senate appropriated an increased sum, but put in a direct provision that it should be expended for the construction of hospitals at those points in the United States where the Federal Board for Hospitalization found the need to be greatest. That bill went to conference, and we had a very bitter fight over it. Finally the Senate won, and it had the backing of the great veterans' organizations that wanted to see hospitals built without regard to politics where the veterans needed them most.

The 34 bills of this character which had been sent by the Senate to the Finance Committee all did violence to that solemnly adopted policy of the Senate and of the Congress, and, consequently, there was no need to refer them to subcommittees, but the Finance Committee as a whole acted upon those 34 bills and tabled every one of them. I am sure that the good sense of the Senate and of the country will commend our action in so doing.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but I merely wish to point out that the figures which I presented the other day, which were derived from the Legion, showed that 168 veterans' bills had gone to the committee, of which the committee had reported 6 favorably. The Senator from Pennsylvania said that that must be entirely erroneous, that he remembered a great many more bills than that which had been reported favorably, and yet, from the figures which he has just presented, it is clear that exactly 6 bills have been reported favorably out of the 170, rather than 6 out of 168, which is the statement I made on Monday.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator give me the page reference to his statement. I have been looking for it, but have been unable to find it.

Mr. CUTTING. It is on page 12757 of the RECORD of June 13.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. The Senator's figures were that 168 bills had been referred to the committee and that was correct, no doubt, as of the date on which the statement was prepared. He stated that 39 were reported adversely without hearing.

My impression is, Mr. President, that there were hearings given in some of the cases. I know that I myself was a subcommittee in the case of perhaps a dozen of them, and I heard the veterans and heard Senators who favored the bills in two or three of the cases.

Mr. CUTTING. It is true, is it not, Mr. President, that no hearings have been held by the whole committee during this session of Congress on any proposed veterans' legislation?

Mr. REED. No hearings have been held by the whole committee; that is quite true; but that is common in the case of the committees of the Senate. It is quite common for committees to appoint subcommittees to hear witnesses. We know that that is done by the Claims Committee and we know that it is done by the Committee on Naval Affairs and by the Committee on Military Affairs. The very necessities of the case require that the testimony be taken by a subcommittee instead of the full committee. At this very moment a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency is studying the operations of the stock exchanges. It is not practicable for all of the members of the committee to give up all of their other work and undertake a particular task of that sort, and it would not do any good for them to do it.

The Senator from New Mexico, on page 12757, stated that of these bills, 39 were reported adversely without hearing. The number reported adversely, according to the clerk of the Finance Committee, was 45.

He then states that 11 were reported adversely by the committee and subsequently recommitted to the committee. Those, I think, were principally bills that had been introduced by the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], whose very serious illness at that time made it seem unfair to act adversely upon them in his absence. It was not that the committee had changed its mind, but it was trying to be considerate to him, and therefore sent the bills back to the committee. Since his recovery—which we are all glad to see—the Senate has been so pressed that there has been no chance to take action on his bills.

The Senator then says that two were tabled in the committee. I do not know how that impression got out. As a matter of fact, 34 were tabled in the committee, and they were these hospital bills that I have spoken about.

The Senator then said that on 110 bills the committee had taken no action. As a matter of fact, the committee has taken action on all but 37 out of the 170 bills that were before it.

Finally, he says:

> On just six has favorable action been taken.

And that is correct.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. The only action taken on 99 of these bills was to refer them to a subcommittee, was it not?

Mr. REED. Oh, no, oh, no! Of those subcommittee bills, 45 have already been reported adversely and six favorably. Fifty-one of them, therefore, have been reported to the Senate, have been acted upon by the Senate, or are now on the Senate Calendar. Practically all of them have been acted upon.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is 51 out of 170.

Mr. REED. Why, yes. Does the Senator suggest some other action on those 34 hospital bills? If so, what action?

Mr. BROOKHART. I would not suggest any action without knowing about them.

Mr. REED. I have just tried to describe them. They are bills commanding the erection of veterans' hospitals in particular towns, in violation of the policy of the Congress laid down after long discussion last year. The Senator surely does not want us to violate that policy, does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. Even if I did not, I think the other committee could handle it quite as well as the Finance Committee, with its overworked condition.

Mr. REED. The Finance Committee is not complaining of being overworked. The Senator is making all the complaint for that committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. The reason why the Finance Committee does not complain is because, for some reason, it wants to hold this jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. BROOKHART. When it does not any more belong to that committee than does the jurisdiction of the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. REED. Ah, but we have always had it. The World War veterans' act was handled by the Finance Committee, and it is only natural that its subsequent amendments should be handled by it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. It seems to me that we fully understand this situation. Why not have a vote on it, and let us see what the Senate thinks about it?

Mr. REED. Do we understand it? The Senator has just made a wholly erroneous statement about the action taken by the committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator only found 51 bills out of 170 there; and 99, according to the first statement I understood him to make, were just referred to a subcommittee.

Mr. REED. That is right; and 51 of them have already been reported to the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. All but six unfavorably.

Mr. REED. All but six unfavorably; and I am going on to describe those in a minute.

Mr. BROOKHART. As I compare the statements, the Senator has made his worse for the committee than what the Senator from New Mexico put in.

Mr. REED. Quite the contrary. The Senator from New Mexico said there were 110 bills unacted upon. I am just showing that there are only 37 bills unacted upon.

Mr. BROOKHART. Those simply referred to a subcommittee are unacted upon. The Senator can not claim action on those. That is only a preliminary step toward action.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I just want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the veterans of the country have no confidence in the present system, as he perfectly well knows. There is not a veterans' organization in the country that believes they get a square deal under the present system.

The veterans' organizations of the country have been seeking this change. They have been begging Members of the Senate to vote for a change, to have a committee that would consider their legislation, which they feel at present is pigeon-holed and not considered. That being true, I think it is scarcely fair for the Senator from Pennsylvania, brilliant as he is, to attempt to discredit the intelligence of other Members of the Senate. I think other Members of the Senate, perhaps, have studied this question, perhaps not quite as deeply and profoundly as the Senator from Pennsylvania but enough to know something about what it all means. Therefore I plead with the Senator—and I think I can speak for the veterans of the country in making this plea—to let the Senate express its will on this question before 12 o'clock.

There are only 20 minutes yet to go. I ask the Senator, just in all decency, to give the rest of us Members here, along with himself, credit for some intelligence in connection with this legislation, this proposed change in rules. Just let the Senate express its will on this question. I think perhaps it might find expression of its desire just as easily without any further advice from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am not sure. I know that advice would be welcomed by the Senate; but, since time is of the essence, I am wondering if the Senator will not let us vote on this question now and at least let the veterans of America know that they have had a vote on this proposition, which they have been pressing here for the last two years.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; I have heard that story often before.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator has; and in the seven years I have been here the Senator has invariably taken the position that I think is against their best interests. The Senator never hesitates to take a very prominent position when the financial interests of the country are before the Senate with proposed legislation. Why should the Senator interpose himself against this vote now, after years of pleading on the part of the veterans of America, the veterans of the wars of the country? No other Senator, I think, attempts any interposition. Why should the Senator interpose himself now between the veterans and a vote on this proposition, which they feel is necessary for their own best interests—those who have bared their breasts to the foes of the country and never have hesitated for a moment or faltered?

The Senator is a veteran himself, and a distinguished veteran. I give him great credit for the service he has rendered his country. I do him honor here in the presence of the Senate and the country; but why will not the Senator now permit a vote on this question in which his comrades are interested, and let other Members of the Senate express their desires and their will in the matter, without any further advice from the Senator?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, has the Senator finished his question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes. That was my comment as to what the Senator said, that he had been hearing this for years; and I am agreeing with him that he has, and I assume he will hear it for years still in the future unless something is done.

Mr. REED. The Senator has finished his question, has he?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes. That is in answer to the Senator's observation. That is the end of my statement.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator if he has anything further to say.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the Senator permit a vote, then?

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator to say anything else, but when he has finished I want to reply to him. I do not want to start to reply until he has finished.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator could reply better, perhaps, if I took my seat. I assume that that is what he means.

Mr. REED. I am glad to talk to the Senator standing, sitting, kneeling, or in any other position.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why does not the Senator just go ahead, then, and proceed?

Mr. REED. I shall as soon as I am permitted to go ahead in my own time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, first as to the statement that the veterans of the country know that I have been opposing their interests. I will grant you that I have not been waving the bloody shirt and howling for the veterans in season and out, with justice or without. I have not been voting for bonus bills for those men who were not disabled, because I feel that veterans like myself, who came out of the war with a whole skin, are owed nothing by their country. We did only what was a matter of course for us to do. We came out without any injury whatever. I came out physically better than I went in, and the country owes me nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But about four million of them went in, or approximately that number went in, and continued their service throughout——

Mr. REED. So did I.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. At the rate of $30 a month, a dollar a day, the enlisted men.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And many of them left positions that were paying them $100 a month or more.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And after the war was over, immediately we reimbursed the railroads for all they had suffered in loss of income during the war, millions, hundreds of millions of dollars. We did not ask them to wait until 1945. We paid them cash—cash.

We readjusted the earnings of civil employees here in Washington and throughout the Government service, because they had had small earnings during the war. I think the lowest any of them got was $250 as a bonus, as readjustment. I do not quarrel with that. I think it was perfectly proper to do it. We recognized that it was a debt the country owed these people who had refrained from taking the big wages that were possible during the war. But we paid them cash. We did not ask them to wait until 1945.

So, finally the lad who was serving for $30 a month, a dollar a day, trenching in mud, many of them; often without food; stopping bullets on the other side, many of them—and equal honor and glory to those on this side, whether they served here or there; they were ready to serve and ready to die, if it were necessary, and to take their places right in the line—"Well," they thought, "maybe, perhaps, since the Government is readjusting the railroads' earnings, and readjusting the earnings of the civilian employees, maybe the Government might add a little to the dollar a day we got for the length of time we were in the service at $30 a month." So they asked the Government to do something for them; and in 1924 the Government said, in effect: "Yes; you are right. We will add about $2 a day to your pay." That means $3 a day for stopping bullets and for being willing to give their lives to the country. "We will give you $3 a day—approximately $2 in readjustment." That was in 1924. "But you boys are patriots. You will have to wait"—evidently feeling that they had not done enough yet—"you will have to wait until 1945 for yours. We paid the railroads cash; that is true. We paid cash to the civilian employees in readjustment; that is true; but you, who made possible the preservation of this Government and this very building in which we stand, whose action gave it substance and continued its being, will have to wait until 1945."

Finally the Congress did say, "We will loan you some money. We will loan you 50 per cent of the amount of your certificates at the rate of 4½ per cent interest. It is costing the Government only 2 per cent, but we will lend you your own money at 4½ per cent." We loaned it to them. Now they are asking not for a bonus but they are asking for the payment of the debt the Government owes them. It has been said that the debt will not be due until 1945; it was due the day the armistice was signed. There is no question about it in the world. If the Government owed them the money it says it owed them, the readjustment should have been made then. There was no occasion to wait until 1945.

The Senator possibly did come out of the service himself in excellent shape, but he need only look around the least bit to find thousands and hundreds of thousands who came out of the service wrecked, mentally, many of them, many of them physically, and I am pleading for them, and through this legislation now to change this rule, I am pleading that they might have a committee which would at least be responsive to their pleas and at least show some friendship toward them.

Mr. REED. That is the kind of speech, Mr. President, that we have been hearing here——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not from the lips of the Senator from Pennsylvania, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators must address the Chair if they want to interrupt, and the Chair will again suggest that Senators should interrupt only to ask questions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is very hard for me to finish within the time that I had allotted to myself when so much of my time has been taken by the Senator from Indiana. It makes it very difficult for me to condense into a few minutes the thoughts I was trying to express to the Senate.

What I meant to say, however, in reply to the Senator's fifteenth or sixteenth question—I have lost count of them—was that he is not alone in thinking about those who are maimed and disabled and crippled, because while the Senator was talking about them I was acting for them.

As chairman of the committee on the investigation of the Veterans' Bureau, I had an active share in sending Director Forbes to jail, in preparing, and drafting, and introducing, and managing through the Senate the World War veterans' act of 1924, the act under which these maimed and disabled veterans are getting the compensation which they are receiving to-day, the act under which these hospitals are being built.

The Senator implies I have done nothing for the disabled veterans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have suggested nothing of the kind.

Mr. REED. The Senator certainly said that I had done nothing for those who were maimed and disabled.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I do not think the RECORD will show that I said any such thing. But I do say the Senator's record speaks for itself.

Mr. REED. I hope it does.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Here is the record made, and I invite the attention of the Senator to his own record for the past seven years. That is all I undertook to say about anything the Senator had done.

The Senator says he has been acting. He is acting now. Does he think he is acting in their interest at this moment, in refusing to permit a vote on this resolution of the Senator from Iowa before 12 o'clock comes, knowing that it can not after that hour be voted on, in all probability, at this session, when he knows that his own comrades throughout the country, and their representatives in the veterans' organizations, desire it?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me to answer, I think that if they knew the facts, the Senate and our comrades in the service and the country as a whole would not approve the passage of this resolution, and it is my duty to give them the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana rose.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will bear with me just a moment. This resolution has been floating around the Senate for six months and a half. Why did not its advocates press it up to passage when there was time to debate it reasonably and fully? Why did they not undertake to make it the unfinished business, instead of bringing it up in the middle of a busy calendar when debate was limited, as it is now?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. It is not my fault that the Senator from Iowa did not move to bring up his resolution until the last busy days of the session.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I tried all through the last session to bring this resolution up, and I have been trying all through this session to get it up. Most of the time I was dealing with the leader on this side, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and he seemed to be favorable to it, but the Senator from Pennsylvania was kept in the background.

Mr. REED. The Senator never thought I favored his resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. This morning the Senator was absent, and delay was again urged on account of the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I used every reasonable diplomatic way I know about to get this resolution up for consideration at the last session, and also at this session, and it has been jockeyed around and debated. This is the second time it has been filibustered up to 12 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator amazes me. The last time the resolution was up was on Monday. I was not recognized, and I did not say a word in my own time, during all the period the resolution was up. The Senator himself filibustered his resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. Another Senator was detailed to do the filibustering that time. This time it seems to fall on the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Who was that Senator, pray?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. REED. He spoke only 10 minutes. I listened to him with great interest.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is all the time he had to take to beat it, and, of course, he only took what time he had to take.

Mr. REED. But the advocates of the resolution talked 50 minutes, and then resent the Senator from Mississippi talking 10 minutes. What kind of gag rule is that?

Mr. BROOKHART. I did not take two minutes, myself, on the motion and turned it over to the filibusters as quickly as I could.

Mr. REED. The friends of the resolution must have been doing the filibustering, then.

Mr. President, let us see what kind of results we would get if we did what the Senator from Iowa wants us to do, and create this special committee. There has been such a committee in the House for several years. The Senator from Iowa wants to duplicate it here, and he has given the impression to the veterans of the United States that they would profit by the change.

So far in this session—and we have been in session for six months and a half—we have received only two bills, either general or special, from the House dealing with veterans' affairs.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, would the Senator mind telling the Senate just what those two bills were?

Mr. REED. I can find out.

Mr. CUTTING. Is it not true that one of the bills is the widows and orphans' bill, which has been advocated by all the ex-service men's organizations at this session to a greater extent than any other piece of legislation?

Mr. REED. Yes; and the pendency of the bonus bill has probably done more to prevent its being acted on than anything else.

Mr. CUTTING. Has the Committee on Finance given any hearings to ex-service men's organizations on the widows and orphans' bill?

Mr. REED. Not so far as I know. One of the bills to which I referred as having been sent over from the House is H. R. 8578, to provide for pension allowances for widows and children and dependent parents of the veterans of the World War.

Understand me, Mr. President, widows and children and dependent parents of veterans of the World War are receiving compensation to-day if the veteran dies from anything connected with his war service. This bill, about which the Senator from New Mexico speaks, would give compensation to veterans' widows, children, and dependent parents in case the veteran dies of something totally disconnected from the World War.

If he should be hit by a street car to-morrow, under this bill, if it were enacted, his widow and children would receive compensation. If he was killed by an enemy bullet, or if he was taken ill in the service and was disabled or died as a result, his family is now receiving compensation. This bill deals only with non-service-connected deaths.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, is it not a fact that if it had not been for the action taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania in the session of 1930 the veteran who has a non-service-connected disability would not himself be receiving any compensation?

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. CUTTING. Why should not the widows and orphans of those whom the Senator himself has put on the roll be treated just the same as the widows and orphans of those who were on the rolls before?

Mr. REED. I am afraid I do not understand the meaning of the Senator's question. It is true that I, who am accused by the Senator from Indiana of never doing anything for the veteran, introduced the bill, which was enacted, under which disability allowances are now being paid for non-service-connected disabilities. The question is, in the bill of which the Senator from New Mexico speaks, whether we shall extend that system and pay pensions to the widows and the children and the dependent parents of veterans, if those veterans died from something having nothing to do with the war. That is the first bill.

The second bill (H. R. 8173) provides for the renewal of the 5-year level premium term Government insurance policies for an additional 5-year period without medical examination. From my own experience, I know something about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has referred to veterans' bills pending before the Committee on Finance. I would like to make some inquiries of the Senator, so that the RECORD may be better understood.

In the first place, are not the overwhelming number of bills pending before the committee so-called private bills?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; quite so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They are bills introduced in behalf of veterans whose cases have been heard by the Veterans' Administration, and the Veterans' Administration has decreed that they were not legally entitled to service-connected compensation or disability allowances.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Or they are cases which have been in the courts and have been adjudicated against the veterans?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to inquire of the Senator how many letters he has received in connection with those bills during the present session of Congress. As for myself, I do not think I have received half a dozen.

Mr. REED. I would not undertake to guess, but it is very few, letters only from those who were interested.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In regard to these private bills, is the record of the Committee on Finance any different from that of other committees which have private bills pending before them?

Mr. REED. No; not one bit.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My secretary yesterday informed me that my office had approximately 100 private bills pending before committees, most of them pending before the Committeee on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs, and that only a few have been acted on at this session. He has been most diligent, I may say, as the Senator knows in connection with the Committee on Military Affairs, in contacting with the committees and trying to get action from the committees. In some of the cases no action ought to be taken. They are petitions that reports from the Army and Navy Departments indicate have not the merit that justifies favorable and special legislation.

Mr. REED. Of course, that is so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not that the situation exactly in the Committee on Finance, that the great bulk of the bills are private bills, upon which it is really not expected by the Senators who introduce the bills that action will be taken?

Mr. REED. I know that is so. Let me give the Senate two typical cases, one of which came to me as a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, the other having come up the other day in the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. President, if the hour of 12 o'clock arrives while I am speaking, I am going to ask for recognition under whatever business may be pending then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that he can not be taken from the floor. He will have the floor.

Mr. REED. I thank the President.

This is the kind of bill we get, and the country ought to know it. In the Finance Committee there was referred to me, as a subcommittee, a bill to give the full $10,000 of war-risk insurance to the estate of a man who allowed his insurance to lapse in 1923. He did not pay another nickel of premium after 1923, although he was perfectly able-bodied, and was not sick at all, as far as the record showed. He was hit in a traffic accident in 1929, and his relatives induced some Senator to introduce a bill to revive that insurance, which he deliberately allowed to lapse six years before. The very Senator who introduced that bill did not expect that we would act favorably on it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.
